Furniture: Watch those deals

Buying good American brand-name furniture at 35 to 50 per cent discount sounds like a good deal, right?

Ordering it here, within 12 months of your Permanent Change of Station PCS; paying for it in full in four months prior to your PCS; and then having it shipped from the factory to your new duty station at government expense, sounds even better.

But beware of that advertising. Read all claims carefully and then check the Joint Travel Regulations (JTR) on personal property, according to the Household Goods Office.

While this advertising is partially true, it tends to overshadow one important aspect. You may ship personal property at government expense, from any location to a new authorized duty station, providing the cost incurred is equal to or less than that from your current base to the new duty station. Otherwise, you will pay any extra costs that arise from more than one lot for the extra distance and/or weight allowance authorized. That entitlement is good for a minimum of one year from your effective PCS date.

You may order furniture from such corporations and have it shipped, following the above regulations if the furniture has been manufactured and identified as yours prior to your effective PCS orders.

There are three major problems to which these corporations do not address themselves:

- You pay any excess costs incurred if the shipment from the factory costs more than from here to your new duty station.

- If you do not have title to the furniture or if it was not manufactured or identified as yours prior to your PCS date, the government will not 'pick up the tab' for shipping.

- It is true that you're entitled to ship your personal property for a minimum of one year from the date of your PCS. However, bear in mind that you are limited to 180 days of temporary storage at government expense. So you must be ready to receive your furniture within 180 days from your PCS date.

So before you purchase furniture from such companies, make sure you understand the regulations. Sure, it sounds like a fantastic deal, especially since it's open only to military personnel stationed in Europe, Asia or Hawaii. You can probably save money on good furniture too. But make sure you understand that you may have to help "Uncle Sam" pay the shipping bill.

RAPE!

How do you prevent it?

The trauma and shock for a rape victim and her family doesn't end when the physical help is over. The psychological turmoil that some women experience could go on for years if the right help is not received immediately.

At Tripler Army Medical Center (TAMC), there is a Rape Crisis Team (RCT) set up to combat the problems that sometime linger on.

With nine volunteer crisis workers on the staff, managed by the case management coordinator, Miss Yuriko Hiramoto, the RCT begins right away to give emotional aid to the victim and the victim's family.

After the physical examination at TAMC is over, the victim is taken to a private room, escorted by a volunteer worker. The crisis worker is available to answer all questions about what is going on and to give emotional support to the victim.

According to Miss Hiramoto, she has received calls from women who were victims of rapists years ago but never received any help after the physical abuse was over.

"Rape doesn't just leave a physical mark," Miss Hiramoto said, "it leaves a mark on the woman's mind and emotions. Some of the things a woman might experience are nightmares, sleeplessness, fear of being alone, crying spells over just anything, a dirty or ashamed feeling, fear of men, and more. She may feel tense with her family and they in turn may feel tense with her. If this happens to a victim or if someone who was raped in the past, experiences these feelings, I urge her to call and set up a time to talk to a crisis worker. All our workers have attended training classes and are fully prepared to handle the various traumatic areas of rape."

The social worker's office at TAMC for the RCT is located in Ward 17, D-Unit, 1st floor. The number to call is 433-6661.

"Unfortunately," says Mrs. Janice Arnold-Jones of Women Against Rape (WAR), "there are still a lot of myths about rape. A woman who may have invited the attacker into her home because she knew him and thought there was no danger in it, may be afraid people will think she asked for it. People still feel that a man rapes a woman for sex, when in most cases, it is to experience a sense of power. Some say that a woman asks for it by the clothes she wears, but most of the 196 women of the conducted survey, were wearing pants and a loose top. Until these myths are dispelled, there are going to be women raped, and there are going to be women unwilling to report it because of social embarrassment or the fear that she won't be believed."

WAR is trying to dispell these myths by public education. They give seminars and talks to various organizations on Oahu including military installations in addition to working with RCT and other clinics. In these talks, they give measures to take to help prevent rape, self-defense measures and where to look for help after a rape has occurred.

One of the best defenses against rape is preventive measures. These aren't guarantees, but if followed they reduce the attacker's chance of assault.

- Don't admit strangers into your home. If your husband is gone and one of his 'friends' come over, unless you know him well, don't admit him. A surprising number of reported rapes were committed by someone the victim knew.

- Don't walk alone if you're depressed, exhausted or intoxicated. According to Mrs. Arnold-Jones, a woman out alone should act like she owns the street and that she knows where she is going at all times.

"We seem to give off the scent of fear at times," she said, "and this only tends to increase the attacker's feeling of power."

- Don't respond to catcalls, whistles or remarks. These only tend to encourage a possible rapist.

- Don't use your entire name on mailboxes or in the telephone book. Use your initials.

- Don't take shortcuts through alleys and vacant lots.

- Don't depend on doorknob locks alone. Have a chain guard lock installed and, if at all possible, a peep hole for the door. PMO now has a Security Kits program available from Self Help. WMs in the barracks can also obtain chain guards for their rooms from Public Works.

- Don't depend on your car making it where it's going without car trouble or a flat tire. Carry a flashlight with you at all times. Know how to change a flat tire and be quick at it.

- When driving somewhere alone at night, have your keys ready to prevent having to fumble for them at your car. Car keys can also be used as a weapon. Hold the keyring around your finger and in case of an attack, swing them viciously to the attacker's face and eyes.

Again, these preventive measures aren't fail safe. In case you are attacked, there are also some self-defense measures you might use. The thing to remember in using these measures is that they won't result in bodily harm to yourself.

"One weapon that a woman always has is her voice," said Bob Glasgow, a Naval Investigative Service agent here. "She can always scream and in some cases, this has scared would-be attackers off."

Other defense measures to try are:

- An umbrella. This is a useful weapon if aimed at the attacker's vulnerable areas such as throat midsection or groin. Don't be gentle. The attacker isn't making a social call.

- A stomp or kick to the shins or instep can be extremely painful and might give you a chance to run, or scare your attacker off.

Every rape is different and all women react differently. The most experienced emotion raped women is one of fear. This is followed by helplessness and then anger.

"A group of WAR consultants met with some convicted rapists once," says Mrs. Arnold. "One man said he attacked a woman, and when she screamed, he ran like hell. Another man said his victim screamed and he slit her throat. So a woman should try and be sure that her fighting him won't result in her harm or worse — her death."

Rape is a subject that most women never think about, an idea that it happens to someone else. But if you're a woman, you're also a potential rape victim. Know what can happen and where you should go for help.

According to Glasgow, a lot of rapes never get reported.

"Obviously, if a rape is never reported we can't do anything about it. But if women knew more about it and of what to do should it occur, it's easier to give her all the help she needs, both physically, mentally and legally."

"The victim," Glasgow continued, "is the strongest piece of evidence for a rape case. She must be willing to come forward and tell what has happened. She also has to be able to withstand the persistent and seemingly ruthless attack to her character and story by the defense counsel."

"Justice is a two-edged sword," he concluded, "where everyone is entitled to equal legal representation. This doesn't always seem right, but it's the law and there for every American."

Rape is an ugly experience and not always avoidable, but with the right physical and emotional help, it can be dealt with and a normal life can be resumed. But to do this, people must educate themselves about the crime, and the laws pertaining to it.

Kauai sees Marines at Capt. Cook festival

Marines, in the air and on the land — members of the Kaneohe Marine Parachute Team and Marines from the 1st Marine Brigade here, joined forces with the people of Kauai Saturday, in celebration of the landing of Captain James Cook 200 years ago. The celebration took place in the southwest coast town of Waimea.

The 1st Marine Brigade Drum and Bugle Corps marched in the Captain Cook Festival Parade which included about 90 other entries. Among the other entries were characters from the movie Star Wars, festival royalty on horseback, school bands and marching units, and numerous floats.

Recruiters from the 1st Marine Brigade Recruiting Office here, were also on hand to explain the different enlistment options the Corps has to offer, and give information on the current 'Come Home to Hawaii' program.

A highlight of the festival was when members of the Kaneohe Marine Parachute Team gave a demonstration at the Russian Fort Elizabeth, located outside the small town.

The jumps consisted of a two-man jump, a one-man break-away, another two-man jump and a four-man star formation. They were received with enthusiasm by all and swamped with eager children, all asking, "How?"

While on the island, the members of the club also attempted to break the current record for the Hawaiian Islands of an all military 9-man star formation. Of the two attempts made at this, the 10-man goal wasn't reached. However they did tie the current 9-man record and established a record for the island of Kauai.

Members of the Parachute Team were from the Air Station, Schofield Barracks, Barbers Point and Fort Shafter.

NOTE: For anyone interested in learning the sport of parachuting, they should contact Gunnery Sergeant Arthur R. Ybarra, at 257-2680. The next class starts Tuesday and will last approximately two weeks.

SOMETHING FOR EVERYONE — The Kaneohe Marine Parachute Team (above) and the 1st Marine Brigade Drum and Bugle Corps each give a performance of what they do best Saturday, during the Captain Cook Festival at Waimea on the island of Kauai. The Parachute team astounded young and old alike during a jumping demonstration. Offering a different kind of entertainment, the Drum and Bugle Corps marched in the town's two-hour long parade.

Many individuals outside of the aviation community might consider the F-4J Phantom aircraft to be just a twin-engine, two-seater, high performance aircraft capable of delivering missiles and bombs on a target.

However according to the experts, the F-4J is more than a fighter attack jet. It is a highly complicated weapons system that requires skilled and knowledgeable technicians with three or four years of training and experience to keep it airborne.

Currently 15 technical representatives (tech reps) from the companies responsible for building component parts of the McDonnell Douglas aircraft are conducting a two-week Integrated Weapons Systems Review (IWSR).

The review will speed up the learning process for 47 maintenance technicians from Marine Fighter Attack Squadrons (VMFA)-212 and (VMFA)-232.

"Our objective," said Chief Warrant Officer Phillip Bocker, officer-in-charge of the current IWSR, "is to train these field mechanics in proper maintenance techniques with the most up to date equipment, train a nucleus of personnel capable of training others and to prepare for WestPac deployment."

The students attended classes for two days reviewing the basics of their respective MOSs. Following the review, the Marines received on-the-job training working with the technical representatives. Ordnancemen, avion-ics technicians and metalsmiths are a few of 19 MOSs needed to support an F-4J squadron. These handpicked Marines will become the vanguard of support for their squadron when deployed.

Working with technical reps on two aircraft enhanced their training. "Being with the Marines and answering their questions is our job," said Robert Schultz, NAESU (Naval Aviation Engineering Service Unit). He heads the group of tech reps conducting the IWSR. Each tech rep is an expert on a particular component in the aircraft. Whenever a squadron has a difficult problem, the tech rep is called in to solve the problem or contact his

Also what the Marines have learned from the 'tech reps' will be demonstrated on a daily basis during the upcoming deployment," he concluded.

UP FOR TWO MORE POINTS — Camp Smith's Warren Harris drives for two more points against Marine Barracks' J. Mason in the final game of the Hawaii Marine Athletic Council Basketball Tournament

Varsity cagers swipe HMAC tournament

The Hawaii Marine varsity basketball team having played together for the past few months had no problems in securing the championship in the annual Hawaii Marines Athletic Council Basketball Tournament held aboard the air station on Jan. 18, 19 and 21.

On Jan. 18, Camp Smith hopeful of a win against the experienced Hawaii Marines found the going rough as the varsity team glided to a 147-85 win, led by Norris Chappell with 46 points.

Later, the second game pitted the visiting Marine Barracks from Pearl Harbor against the Kaneohe Marines (JV). This game unlike the other, was much closer with the final score 106-103 in favor of the Marine Barracks.

The next night the winners of the previous evening battled to stay undefeated but the varsity team were not to be denied this win. The Hawaii Marines won 109-85 over Marine Barracks increasing their perfect record to two wins and no losses.

Following that game, the losers of the previous night tangled in a hard fought contest only to see K-Bay go down in defeat to Camp Smith 85-78. Camp Smith's scoring attack was led by Joseph Buggs with 33 points.

After a one-day layoff for all teams, Saturday was the final day of the tournament. The first game saw Camp Smith (1-1) and Marine Barracks also (1-1) in tournament play, waging war for the second place spot. They struggled throughout the entire game with the lead bouncing back and forth. Joseph Buggs again was the high scorer for Camp Smith with 31, leading them to victory over Marine Barracks 87-72.

The second game matched the first place team Hawaii Marines against the last place team K-Bay Marines. But at game time there was not enough members from the K-Bay team to play, therefore the game was forfeited to the Hawaii Marines making them the undisputed champions of the tournament.

Fear of flying?

You never even leave the ground

By SSgt. Al Cox

"Flying high performance aircraft is almost like a natural high, the adrenalin starts pumping and everything is happening so fast that you forget all your troubles, you just don't have time for them."

A statement from a reminiscing "Phantom Flyer"? Not hardly. Those are the words of First Lieutenant Bill Beal, 31, Marine Aircraft Group-24's assistant S-1 officer and one of the thousands of RC (radio-controlled) modelers nationwide.

IT'S WHAT?

What is RC modeling? A sport? A hobby? A heck of a lot of fun? Yes, and more, it is also a challenge to mind and body.

Bill is a native of Santa Rosa, Calif., with five years experience under his belt in flying all types of RC aircraft including powered, and helicopters.

Preferring gliders for their slower, more relaxing aspects, he still enjoys the exhilaration of powered flight and is now putting the finishing touches on his new biplane.

NOT SO CHEAP

Initial expenses in RC modeling are high as hobbies go (minimum $140 soaring and $175 power) so be sure it is what you want before "jumping in with both feet." The best way to do that, according to Bill, is to "come out and watch us fly. Most RC modelers are very accommodating and will answer any questions you might have."

If you decide to go ahead with RC, the next step is to decide which field of modeling you are most interested in. In addition to aircraft there are also boats (both power and sail), and cars available.

KEEP IT SIMPLE

Next comes your equipment. The watchwords as far as this goes are "KEEP IT SIMPLE." A good starting power aircraft, for example, would be one with a large engine, high wing and tricycle landing gear.

Your next purchase is your radio. This may be new or used, but it is a good idea to stay away from "home builds" as they are often undependable.

In order to operate a radio, a Class 'C' FCC license is required. This is the same license required to operate a CB radio, but your CB license will not work for RC Modeling. You must obtain a new one.

The FCC also encourages you to join the Academy of Model Aeronautics (AMA) as a member. Many flying fields require that you be a member of the AMA before you will be allowed to utilize their facilities. They want to know that all pilots are knowledgeable concerning the AMA Safety Code and, through membership, have liability insurance.

TALKING SHOP

Next, you may want to join a local club. "There are a number of reasons this may be desirable," contends Bill, "Other than contests, insurance discounts and parts discounts at some of the local hobby shops, the best reason to join a local club is the vast pool of knowledge through 'talking shop' with other members."

One of the main considerations in learning RC flying is, of course, safety. Powered aircraft travel at speeds well in excess of 100 MPH and can be lethal when in inexperienced hands.

SPEEDS THAT CAN KILL

"I belong to the Mid-Pacific Soaring Society which deals in glider flying. We fly both slope soaring and thermal soaring. Our primary flying site is located in the Kawaiinui Regional Park across from Kalaheo High School. We share the site with a power airplane and helicopter club."

When asked about the length of time it takes to become a proficient RC pilot, Bill replied, "I guess most people solo after about two or three hours of flight time, but there are so many variables that it may not take that long. But, then again, it could take much longer, especially if you try to teach yourself."

If RC sounds like it could be for you, why not go out to the flying field some weekend and get acquainted with some of the RC enthusiasts. For more information contact 1stLt. Beal at 257-2495.
