Squadron flies to Kenya for Natural Fire

Cpl. Roman Yurek
Combat Correspondent

The Marines of Marine Heavy Helicopter Squadron 463 "Pegasus" deployed to Mombasa, Kenya, Tuesday to participate in the joint-combined exercise Natural Fire.

Two of the squadron's CH-53D "Sea Stallions" and dozens of Marines from a variety of 1st MAW units will spend almost the entire month of May practicing humanitarian disaster relief scenarios and helping the military of Kenya enhance its disaster relief capabilities.

Also, the Aviation Support Element, ASEK; HMM-366; and HMM-362 all have Marines making the trip, said Maj. Douglas Scott, HMM-463 operations officer.

The Marines will participate in Natural Fire alongside units from 1st Marine Expeditionary Force.

According to Scott, the Hawaii Marines will provide transportation of supplies and troops. They will also aid in an injured personnel evacuation scenario during the exercise.

Many of the deployed Marines have participated in Combined Arms Exercise '99 in California, but Scott said this is the first deployment for many of the squadron's Marines.

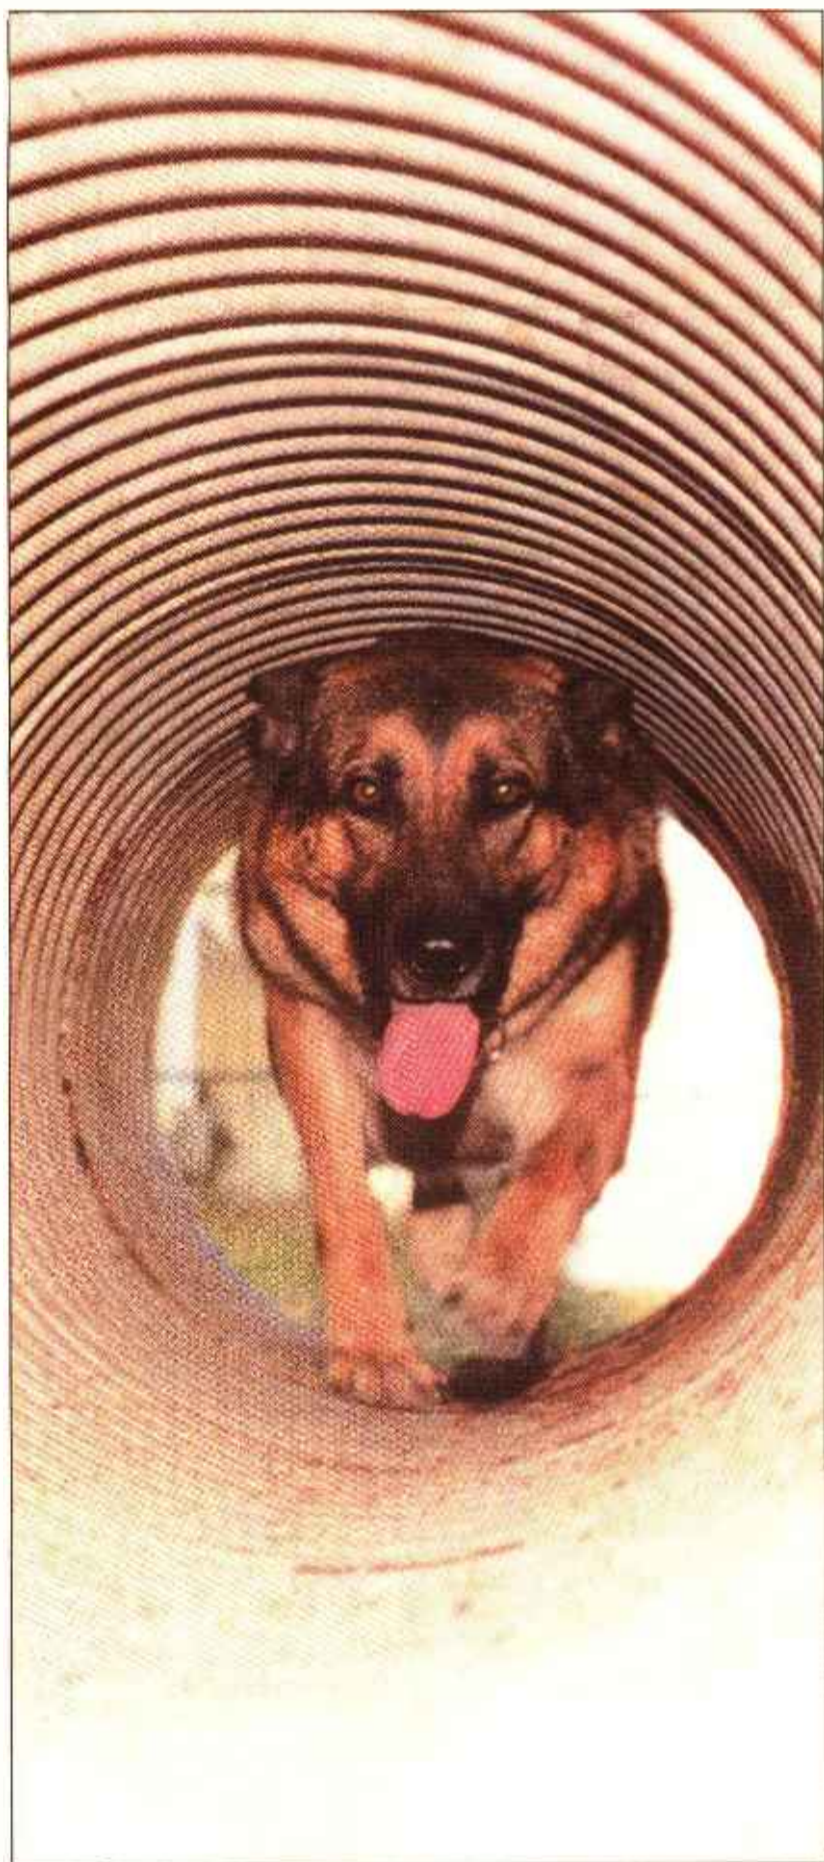

Prior to deployment, the squadron was briefed extensively on the health risks, environmental concerns, and terrorist situation in Kenya, said 1st Lt. Anthony Frost, HMM-463 maintenance material control officer. "The briefs are important because working in a Third-World country involves risks that are new to many of these Marines."

The U.S. Air Force assisted the Marines and their equipment in C-5 "Galaxy" aircraft from Hickam Air Force Base to Kenya. The squadron and attached Marines are scheduled to return to Hawaii at the beginning of June.

Members of the Hawaii Audubon Society visited the Ulupau Wildlife Management area aboard MCB Hawaii April 20th to see parent Red-footed Booby birds caring for their hatchlings. The nesting area is home to one of only two large populations of birds on any of Hawaii's inhabited islands. See page A-5.

Top Dog

Amber, shown here navigating the tunnel at the MCB Hawaii Provost Marshal's Obstacle Course, along with her handler, Cpl. Shawn C. Gibbons, received the top award in the tactical obedience category of the Department of Defense Canine Trials at Lackland Air Force Base, Texas last week. The Trials included competition from all over the world, and from all services. Gibbons said he is extremely proud of Amber's performance, and said this recent competition was not the only time she has performed well. For a photo of Gibbons with Amber, and the full story, see page A-10.

Rifle range to upgrade soon

Cpl. Otto C. Pleil-Muets
Combat Correspondent

The known-distance course at the rifle range of Range Training Facility, MCB Hawaii, is scheduled to be upgraded soon with the most advanced scoring system in the Marine Corps.

The rifle range at MCB Hawaii, Kaneohe Bay, is the test site for new technology that will lighten the load for shooters assigned to the range and provide more accurate scoring for Marines on the Known Distance range.

The electronic system is expected to make several changes to the experience of Marines that take their annual rifle re-qualification.

"The Location of Misses and Hits system will increase efficiency and the accuracy of scorekeeping," said Chief Warrant Officer 4 Randall Harris, the officer in charge of Range Training Facility, MCB Hawaii. "Having the new system will translate into having more Marines go to the rifle range at a time and have them spend less time there."

The system replaces the need for Marines to pull targets down in the pits and keep score of the shots. Instead, the system can electronically detect the location of shooters' rounds on the target and automatically keep the score.

Monitors, approximately three inches wide and placed on each shooting position at the firing line, will give shooters an exact location of their impacts.

"It's not new technology, but the Marine Corps has just now been able to adopt it," said Harris. "K-Bay will be the test site for this system in the Marine Corps."

Harris said another benefit of the range project includes the ability of Marines to use their SMART cards to check into and out of the range, and automatically process rifle scores to commands, reducing the amount of paperwork currently used to pass the information.

Although the starting date for the project is still uncertain, Pu'uloa Training Facility will be ready to accommodate all Marines until the range is ready, said Gunnery Sgt. Ken Brandon, the rifle range staff noncommissioned officer in charge at Pu'uloa Training Facility.

During the future project, the rifle range will be closed and rifle details from K-Bay are scheduled to be transported daily to Pu'uloa Training Facility for their annual re-qualification. The range upgrade project is not expected to interfere with the regular pistol range requirements at K-Bay.

Fed agencies study long term, other Anthrax vaccine effects

Army Staff Sgt. Kathleen T. Rhem,
American Forces Press Service

WASHINGTON, D.C. — Federal agencies are collaborating in a major study into long-term health effects of the anthrax vaccine used by DoD, Deputy Defense Secretary Rudy de Leon testified April 13 before the Senate Armed Services Committee.

The Centers for Disease Control in Atlanta heads the $20 million, multiyear study and is working with DoD, the Food and Drug Administration and the National Institutes of Health, de Leon said in a prepared statement. The study will document possible long-term effects and examine risk factors for adverse reactions and dosing.

"The DoD leadership ... are aware of and respect the concerns expressed by a small number of service members about possible long-term health effects," de Leon said. At least 12 studies involving more than 16,000 vaccine recipients have been conducted and show common short-term side effects include local injection site reactions, headache, slight fever, joint pain and fatigue.

Program officials have said women seem nearly twice as likely as men to have a local reaction at the injection site. Currently, the anthrax vaccine is injected subcutaneously, or directly below the skin. The new CDC collaboration will seek to determine if the vaccine is as safe and effective if injected into muscle, which may reduce localized reactions, a DoD anthrax immunization program official said.

The study will also look at whether the current six-dose regimen could be cut to five or even four shots and whether individuals need annual booster shots, the official said.

A second, separate long-term study is following 570 test and control subjects previously employed at Fort Detrick, Md. De Leon said the purpose of the study, begun in 1996, is to examine the effects of receiving multiple vaccines, including the one for anthrax.

"All volunteers signed an approved informed-consent document. The study media included a nine-page health history questionnaire, extensive blood tests and urinalysis," de Leon said in his testimony. "The questionnaire queries mental and physical conditions of progeny as well as the health of the volunteers. Study end points include symptoms, ... diseases, [and] abnormal laboratory and urine tests."

In his testimony, the deputy secretary also told Congress that DoD urges all members who believe they've had an adverse reaction to report it through the FDA's Vaccine Adverse Event Reporting System.

"Not only are members encouraged to submit a report, but families or anyone personally aware of a situation can as well," he said. "We listen. We are concerned."

Individuals can file FDA adverse event reports on DoD's anthrax Web site at www.anthrax.osd.mil, or by calling the FDA's toll-free information line, 1-800-822-7967. The site also presents current reporting statistics for DoD's anthrax immunization program.

De Leon's statement reiterated DoD's resolve to vaccinate all service members in high-risk areas. "Currently, about a dozen nation states are known to possess or have in development a biological warfare capability. There is also evidence that a small number of terrorist groups appear to be interested in biological agents," he said. "Of all known biological warfare agents, anthrax spores are the top choice ... for germ warfare."

He said Iraq has admitted to producing anthrax spores and putting them into weapons. Furthermore, he said, the death of 64 people by anthrax in a 1979 accident at Sverdlovsk (now Ekaterinburg), Russia, demonstrates the former Soviet Union's research with the organism.

SERGEANT MAJOR'S CORNER

E-mail is not a substitute for requesting mast

Sgt. Maj. Robert W. Holub
Marine Forces Pacific Sergeant Major

Let me ask you something. How many of you think barging into your commander's office unannounced to speak about a personal request or problem without the professional courtesy of making an appointment, or taking the time to see your platoon sergeant, non-commissioned-officer-in-charge, company first sergeant or executive officer is the proper thing to do? Not many, right? Well, when you send an unsolicited e-mail to him or her asking them for some personal favor or about a personal problem that is exactly what you're doing. It is this type of "electronic" barging in that I would like to talk to you about this week.

Holub

In the first place, barging into anyone's offices is not proper etiquette, is it? It shows a lack of respect on your part for whoever you're trying to see. Also, you run a very good chance of having whoever you barged in on get fired up and throw you out of the office even before he or she listens to your problem, don't you? Most of you know there are certain rules and regulations which govern the naval services, and civilized society in general, and tell us the proper manner to have official meetings with officers in the chain of command to discuss a problem or request some type of service or action. This "official" meeting is, of course, called requesting mast.

Unfortunately, I am seeing an increase in the number of Marines who think it is OK to sit down at their computers and jam out electronic request masts, personal requests or gripes directly to officers, or the Commandant for that matter, without using the established chain of command. That concerns me. Hopefully, most of you know this is not the right way to do things, but apparently there is that 1 percent who think there is nothing wrong with electronically requesting mast or asking for something from an officer. It is to them whom I would like to talk to.

For whatever reason, there are those of you who think you are not bound by the military protocol that governs everyone else in the naval services. You seem to think you are somehow special or that those particular rules, which govern the good order and discipline of the armed forces, do not apply to you. You take it upon yourselves to electronically "barge" into your commanders' offices unannounced anytime and anyplace you choose to have your grievances heard. In short, you're more special than the rest of us. ... WRONG!!!!

Now, I am all for technology; however, there seems to be a growing trend as more and more Marines have access to computers to believe that just because commander's names appear on the global listing, it gives them the right to correspond directly with them about any grievances or concerns they have. This is not the way things work in the Marine Corps and until someone changes the way request mast is conducted, it will not be the proper method in which to have problems aired and solutions found.

Before I go any further, let me make it clear that I am all for taking care of someone who has a legitimate problem or concern, but there are rules and regulations which govern any organization for the good order and discipline of that unit. Using request mast to see any commander in your chain is absolutely the best way to have a hearing with someone who can help you with your problem without fear of reprisal from anyone in your unit - officer or enlisted. But notice I said a "legitimate" problem or concern.

You know as well as I do that if you have a problem and request mast that professional behavior on your part will go a long way in having your case heard fairly without prejudice toward yourself or anyone else in your chain of command. Taking a short cut by passing the chain of command by directly e-mailing your gripe to the commander is not professional behavior. By taking the time to properly request mast, you will have your problem or a concern heard fairly, and you will be able to present the facts regarding it to your commander in an organized unemotional fashion. Seeing your commander face-to-face, you stand a very good chance of having the commander see your point more clearly and act on the problem on your behalf.

You don't get that with an e-mail you fire off because you are pissed off at that particular moment.

Going through the steps of officially requesting mast is the best method we have in the naval services and one that I highly recommend if you do have a problem. That is the proper way to things in the naval services and is the way I have seen things done for the last 29 years as a Marine. Believe me, the system works if you have a legitimate problem. It has been my experience that when done properly, everyone in your chain of command will do everything in their power to make sure you are treated fairly and with out prejudice. Shotgunning out an e-mail gripe does you no good.

When used properly, request masts can help you with a problem you may have, but using request mast as the last act of defiance by those who have continually gotten themselves in hot water has never been a popular course of action with anyone in your chain of command. In fact, I have only seen a handful of masts which were legitimate gripes that could not be corrected long before the Marine had to see the commanding officer in an official request mast. On the other hand, I have seen many cases where Marines are already in trouble and are using request mast in an attempt to divert blame toward those who are making them accountable for their actions. It is that type of mast which causes most Marines to lose faith in the system. It is also those types of problems which seem to prompt Marines to e-mail commanders in the hopes that they somehow will divert enough attention away from themselves in a hope to get out of trouble. Believe me, it doesn't work.

"...barging into anyone's office is not proper etiquette, is it? It shows a lack of respect on your part for whoever you're trying to see. Also, you run a very good chance of having whoever you barged in on get fired up and throw you out of the office even before they listen to your problem, don't you?"

Sgt. Maj. Robert W. Holub
Marine Forces Pacific Sergeant Major

Computers are here and save a lot of time getting things done. They are not there for anyone to usurp the chain of command or as a way to have a personal instant request mast. Using one improperly will get you in hot water if you are not careful. Use them for what they were designed for and not as electronic request masts.

If you need to ask your commander for something, be an adult about it and make an appointment and see him or her in person. It is the Marine thing to do.

When is it okay to spank your children?

Nancy Tahara RN, MSN
Marine New Parent Support Program

I was spanked when I was child. I turned out okay.

If you don't spank your children, they will not listen to you.

I'm not going to raise a bad kid. If he/she needs it, I will show them who is in charge.

The "reasons" go on and on. Let's just take a look at these reasons for spanking.

I was spanked when I was a child I turned out okay. What is today's date? April 27, 2000. What were acceptable practices of discipline in the 1960's are NOT acceptable today. We have learned very much in the area of child development in the last 20 years. We have learned that children who are hit at home, hit others. When children are spanked frequently, they have a higher tendency to act out violent behavior with their peers.

If you don't spank your kids, they will not listen to you. Spanking does not make your children listen. Spanking frightens and confuses children. Do you want your children to respect and love you, or fear you?

What does this mean? How can parents put this into practice? Let's say that you have a 10-year-old son named Alex. You have told Alex not to park his bike in the middle of the driveway. You have shown him exactly where his bike should be parked. He continues to park his bike in the middle of the driveway.

Scenario 1: Mr./Mrs. Spanker screams and yells at Alex. "How many times (spank) did I tell you (spank) about parking your bike in the middle of the driveway?" (spank)

Scenario 2: Mr./Mrs. Non Spanker told Alex that if he leaves his bike in the wrong place one more time, he will lose his bike privileges. One day Alex rushes home to watch TV and leaves his bike in the middle of the driveway. Mr. Non Spanker takes Alex's bike and locks it up. He then calmly explains to Alex that he has lost his bike privileges for 2 days. After 2 days, Alex and his parents will sit down and discuss responsibilities of owning a bicycle.

Scenario 2 was calm and respectful—no screaming, no yelling, no hitting! Alex's punishment fit the crime. The punishment was loss of bike privileges. The crime was not being responsible for his bike.

Which approach creates a lasting impression on Alex? Which approach will Alex remember the next time that he parks his bike? Which approach teaches Alex respect and discipline?

We all try to be good Moms and Dads. It's not an easy job! It's only natural to get frustrated sometimes with your children. Hitting and hurting your child is not the answer.

If your children refuse to listen to you, help is available. The Marine New Parent Support Program can help you. You don't have to go to their office—they will come to you! The Marine New Parent Support Program is a group of registered nurses, pediatric nurse practitioners and social workers trained in child development. If you would like more suggestions on getting your children to listen to you, call the Marine New Parent Support Program at 257-8803.

Cohen addresses food stamp housing income inequity

Army Staff Sgt. Kathleen T. Rhein
USA American Forces Press Service

WASHINGTON, D.C. — Secretary of Defense William Cohen proposes to solve a long-standing housing allowance "inequity issue" in a way that probably could make more military families eligible for food stamps.

"This issue is about equity for our people. I support military men and women receiving every federal benefit to which they are entitled," Cohen said in a written statement April 19. He pledged to work with Agriculture Department leaders to "amend current rules so as to exclude the cash housing allowance paid to our people living off base from the computation for eligibility."

"This will provide the equity in pay and benefits we must maintain, while retaining the food stamp benefit for those who truly need it," Cohen wrote.

"We have made great progress in quality of life issues for our military men and women — pay increases, pay table reform, restoration of the 20-year retirement, improvements in health care, and more generous allowances for off-base housing. We can do no less."

"I think this proposed change to the eligibility procedures for food stamps is one more way that we can further improve that quality of life, and I will work vigorously for its implementation."

Current food stamp rules count monthly cash housing allowances as income but not the value of government quarters. Military members who live off base appear to have larger incomes than their peers who live on base. Ironically, the allowance members forfeit to live in base housing covers their costs in full while a cash allowance by law is supposed to cover only 85 percent of off-base housing costs — but actually cover only 81 percent on average, according to DoD statistics.

In January, Cohen proposed raising housing allowances to eliminate members' out-of-pocket expenses within five years. Unless food stamp income rules change, however, the current inequity would continue. Families living off base would receive a larger allowance, but then report an even higher disqualifying income.

Bernard Rostker, President Clinton's nominee to serve as the next undersecretary of defense for personnel and readiness, recently proposed before Congress that the fairness issue could be solved by declaring the value of base housing as income in determining food stamp eligibility. This would reduce the number of military families on food stamps by disqualifying many living in base housing.

Bacon demonstrated the food stamp issue by using the example of a married serviceman in pay grade E-5 with six years' service and three children. If this person lived on base, he'd get base housing but no housing allowance, his pay and a monthly $227.40 subsistence allowance. He would receive $1,919.10 a month in cash — and qualify for food stamps, Bacon said.

The same person, if living off base, would receive pay, subsistence and a monthly $530 cash housing allowance — and have a disqualifying income of $2,449.10.

Some members of Congress have proposed a monthly allowance for service members who are eligible for food stamps. DoD considers the suggestion unfeasible and unfair, Bacon said during the briefing.

Bacon said DoD is trying to lessen the impact of food stamps on service members through measures that benefit all, such as this year's 4.8 percent pay raise and Cohen's proposed housing

BAH In Hawaii

The change in regulations concerning BAH in Hawaii only impacts married Marines whose families do not reside in Hawaii. Previously a Marine whose family did not reside in Hawaii was entitled to BAH at the family's location. As result of the change, a Marine stationed in Hawaii will be entitled to BAH at the Hawaii rate regardless of their family's location. This will be a significant increase in pay due to the difference in Hawaii BAH and the current BAH being paid for the family's location.

DoD revamping, simplifying PCS move process

Rudi Williams
American Forces Press Service

WASHINGTON D.C. — DoD is revamping and simplifying its permanent-change-of-station process to make it easier, faster, less expensive and less stressful for more than 700,000 service members and their family members who move around the world each year.

The initiative is targeted at scrapping mountains of paperwork, eliminating out-of-pocket expenses and creating a user-friendly, Internet-based, personalized, state-of-the-art relocation system.

When the new system is implemented, service members will, among other benefits, save hundreds of dollars in out-of-pocket expenses, spend less time filling out paperwork and visit fewer offices to in- and out-process, according to Stephen Rossetti, director of the Defense Integrated Travel and Relocation Solutions Office in Arlington, Va.

Rossetti said under the plan, that includes proposals before Congress, service members would be offered no-receipt-required, lump-sum payment for temporary lodging expenses, temporary lodging allowances and even a monetary incentive not to ship "junk" cars overseas.

Many service members found a loophole that circumvents the requirement by some services that only those who ship a vehicle overseas can ship one back home. Some service members ship "junk" vehicles with major mechanical problems overseas so they'll be eligible to ship a car home when their tour is over.

"Military people are ordered to move. They have no choice. We need to do all we can to make it easier," Rossetti said.

If approved, the cash incentive would equate to a percentage of the cost of shipping the "junk" car overseas. The shipping cost often exceeds the value of the vehicle. The incentive proposal would guarantee that service members could ship vehicles back home, thereby eliminating unnecessary shipping costs for the government.

Service members and DoD civilian employees ship more than 75,000 cars to and from overseas locations each year. The only requirement is that the vehicle be in working condition.

One of the biggest concerns is out-of-pocket expenses for PCS moves, Rossetti noted. "Surveys have shown that people in the military don't get as much in their reimbursements as they're spending," he noted. "We want to give them the wherewithal to make the most of the money they get and eliminate out-of-pocket expenses."

Service members in grades E-5 to E-9 incur non-reimbursable expenses of more than $1,000 each time they move. That amount increases for higher ranks, Rossetti said.

"Our people are captives to the process," Rossetti said. "We want to flip the current process controls on its back and have the traveler controlling the process."

"There also is a vast network of relocation experts in DoD," he said. "We need to empower them with tools to help our people."

Rossetti noted that revamping and simplifying the PCS system is an important objective of Secretary of Defense Williams S. Cohen and Deputy Secretary Rudy de Leon and is a key aspect of the effort to reform business processes in DoD. "They realize the difficulty of the moving process in the military and asked us to make it easier," Rossetti said. "We see that as a quality of life objective that's important for retention and readiness."

DoD is overhauling pieces of the process, including travel and movement of household goods, he office and a host of other places. It's estimated that more than 40,000 man-hours are wasted each year in- and out-processing.

Simplifying the process includes cutting a 10-volume set of books and nearly 2,000 pieces of PCS entitlement data down to about 100 pages. Liken the current entitlement rules to the tax code, Rossetti said people who have the time to understand it will get the most money back, but those that can't end up spending more. The current process covers 10 functional areas including transportation, household goods, medical, and morale, welfare and recreation, and 406 sub-processes that require 117 forms and information from 36 automated systems.

The plan will incorporate the "one-stop-shopping concept," with the Internet as the integrator. "The Web is transforming America, and we want it to transform this process," Rossetti said.

The new system will be a "stress reducing," user-friendly process that reduces waiting time. "I will also have a personalized Web page outfitted with instructions and 'prepopulated' forms showing the service member's name, family members, entitlements and answers to questions," Rossetti said.

"We want to have the computer take care of service members during their move," he said. "We have something working in the lab called P-3 Quantum, a personal PCS page."

When you key your name, Social Security number and PIN number into the system, your personal profile comes up. The computer knows already, based on our manpower database, who you are, how many kids you have and all the other information that used to go on nearly 100 forms."

The Internet enables relocation personnel to tailor the PCS process to fit each individual's moving situation, Rossetti noted. When the personal profile is validated, the traveler keys in the "from/to" destination and the computer will tell them how much money they'll get for the move. If they select the lump sum option, the money will be electronically transferred to the service member's bank account.

Preparing for household goods shipments will be made easy and take the guesswork out of figuring weight allowances. All service members will have to do is click on a piece of furniture and its approximate weight will be shown and automatically added to the inventory.

The information will be stored on the personal Web page. All the service member has to do on the return trip is delete and add items.

A personalized travel calendar for in- and out-processing will have information pertaining to the losing unit, gaining unit, family information, date of departure, moving pets, firearms, and shipping vehicles. Information about updating drivers licenses, passports, drivers manuals from foreign countries, settling claims, the defense travel system, entitlements, per diem rates and other information needed for a PCS move.

Rossetti said changing the PCS move process is not only a quality of life issue, but a retention and readiness objective.

"If you allow people to get on the ground quicker, we're more productive in terms of use of their time. And, if a PCS isn't so painful, maybe people will be more likely to re-enlist," he said.

Rossetti emphasized that the proposal doesn't increase temporary lodging and temporary housing allowances. "It allows an up-front payment that can be used for any expenses," he said. "For example, it wouldn't require receipts. So if you have an alternative to staying in temporary lodging, you can stay with a relative or friend and use the money for something else associated with a PCS move."

What we care about is you get to your duty station on time and with the least pain."

DoD is also asking Congress to sanction cost avoidance incentives for household goods. "Right now, if you're authorized a 10,000-pound weight allowance, you're going to keep shipping that 10,000 pounds around the world for your whole military career," Rossetti said. "But if you get an incentive not to ship your whole weight allowance, then you won't be tempted to move these barbells or books you've carried around for years."

Several projects are under way concerning household goods moves, including the Full Service Movement Project and the relocation section of the Air Forces Crossroads Web site.

"We'll have a demonstration of the capability in April and the Web site will be up for use this summer," Rossetti noted. "It will be a virtual moving experience. If we can't be like Star Trek and beam you to your new location, we hope to come close."

"Surveys have shown that people in the military don't get as much in their reimbursements as they're spending. We want to give them the wherewithal to make the most of the money they get and eliminate out-of-pocket expenses."

director of the Defense Integrated Travel and Relocation Solutions Office* said. "We want to ... raise the ante to solve the difficult PCS process for our people." Rossetti said.

He said the effort is orchestrated through a steering board that includes the services and other key DoD officials.

Administrative costs soak up a major chunk of the more than $3 billion DoD spends moving people each year, Rossetti said. "Every dollar we can save in administration and give to our people is a dollar they don't have to take out of their pocket to make the move," Rossetti said.

Initial savings are estimated at about $150 million, he said. The amount is expected to swell as other initiatives are implemented.

He said 85 percent of the people who move are dissatisfied with the relocation process. They're upset because their household goods are lost or destroyed and they waste a lot of time in-processing at the library, veterinarian, commissary, personnel

Audobon Society visits Booby Birds

Members of the Hawaii Audubon Society visited the nesting areas of the Red-Footed Booby Birds at the Ulupau Crater aboard MCB Hawaii, Kaneohe, April 20.

The Ulupau Wildlife Management Area is home to one of only two large populations of Red-Footed Boobies on the main Hawaiian Islands.

Hosted by the Base Environmental Office, the guests toured nesting areas and took pictures of the rare sea birds as they fed and cared for their new hatchlings.

"We normally visit this site once a year," explained Mary Gaber, field activities coordinator for the society. "We've been out twice this year though."

Members of the group visited the nesting area in January when many of the birds had just laid eggs. "Now many of those eggs are hatchlings," she added.

The group spent more than an hour on top of the crater taking photos and video footage of the young Booby hatchlings. While touring the area, the group learned of the ways MCB Hawaii is helping to protect the Booby birds.

In addition to enforcing strict regulations regarding human interference with the birds, base officials have taken steps to control species of animals, such as mongoose and feral cats, from disrupting the bird habitat.

To protect the nesting area from the fires that can result from the combination of dry grass and tradewinds, the base is installing a water main system that will allow firefighters to quickly contain any threatening blaze.

Members of the society were also treated to a history lesson during their visit. This was prompted after many wondered about the purpose of the concrete slabs and bunkers visible on the crater's face.

They learned the bunkers were part of an elaborate system built into the crater after the Japanese attack in December 1941. The bunkers were used as firing positions to protect the shoreline of ships and submarines. The bunkers have been sealed up for dozens of years, and now the Red-footed Boobies make their nests there.

"Audubon's main focus is on birds," Gaber said. "That's how, and why we were founded - to help protect them."

After the hour-long tour, the guests loaded back up into vans and headed out the range facility gate. Many of them left with smiles on their faces, and said they anticipate a return to the site to see the full-grown birds flying high over the Ulupau Crater.

Volunteers inspect children's car seats at fair

Sgt. Richard W. Holtgraver
Combat Correspondent

Inspectors from the MCB Hawaii Base Safety Office used the Children's Fair at Mokapu Mall Saturday as an opportunity to inspect child safety seats in vehicles.

Approximately 90 vehicles were checked by inspectors from the Base Safety Department, who looked for child seat serviceability and proper installation.

"Our job here today is to ensure that every child leaves here safer than when they arrived," said Cpl. David W. Eastman, safety inspector for Base Safety Department.

Each inspector underwent a four-day course to become certified child safety seat technicians, said Eastman.

Among the volunteers were three senior inspectors who traveled from other islands to help.

A senior inspector conducts inspections on a regular basis, and has undergone extensive training certified by the Department of Transportation.

The senior inspectors helped their junior counterparts by giving a final stamp of approval on all child safety seats installations.

A major problem with the car seats inspected at the safety checkpoint was loose installation.

"It's one thing to put the car seat in a vehicle the way the instruction manual says to, but to make sure that a car seat is secure enough to save a child from injury in a crash is another matter," explained Eastman.

Nine car seats were declared unsafe by inspectors Saturday, many of them due to broken or missing parts.

One particular seat of the nine was more than seven-years-old, meaning the seat was manufactured before current State and Federal regulations governing design and installation of child safety seats became law.

Parents who purchase used child safety seats from private owners or thrift stores need to check that the car seat meets current safety standards and regulations.

"Statistics show that over 90 percent of the car seats in Hawaii are misused," said Eastman. "Nationwide, that statistic is 85 percent."

According to Eastman, there are other safety issues parents should consider when transporting their children in a vehicle.

"Objects in a car can become projectiles in a crash," he warned. "In a crash, anything (not secured) has a force of its weight times the speed of the vehicle."

That means a two pound library book sitting in the rear seat of a car travelling at 40 MPH has a striking force of 80 pounds on whatever it hits during a collision.

"Out of 87 car seats that we inspected today, none of them were installed correctly," informed Jeff Wilson, explosives safety officer and traffic manager for MCB Hawaii. "Of those 87, all left the checkpoint with a properly installed and safe car seat."

Although a majority of the people who brought their car seats to the safety checkpoint to get looked at had already been using their car seats incorrectly, one couple showed up for a different reason.

"Our first child is due to be born the 27th of June," said Gunnery Sgt. Robert Leal of the Marine Forces Pacific Band. "It's a good opportunity to get this done correctly and not have to worry about if we had put it seat in right."

Parents who are unsure if their car seats are installed correctly can call the Base Safety Department at 257-1830 or 257-1831.

Cpl. David W. Eastman inspects a child safety seat during a safety checkpoint at the MCB Children's Fair at the Mokapu Mall Saturday. Eastman also showed parents how to properly install the child safety seat.

Delivering equipment and training

Sgt. Mikey Niman
MCB Quantico, Public Affairs Office

MARINE CORPS BASE QUANTICO, Va.— A better, safer and easier to use personal battle equipment system has been created for Marine reconnaissance units. By Friday, 360 recon Marines throughout the Corps will have the newest issue of gear, created in less than three months at Marine Corps Systems Command, and will have received rigorous training on how to use it.

The Full Spectrum Battle Equipment replaces the previously-used system with many improvements, which make movement underwater easier for Marines.

"There were a lot of flaws in the old gear," said Capt. Randy Hoffman, MarCorSysCom Ground Weapons, Raids and Recon Section project officer. "It was heavy, and there was not enough flotation."

The high weight and low buoyancy of the old gear made simple procedures, such as under water helicopter egress drill, difficult, said Hoffman.

The previously used Close-Quarters Battle Equipment was 28 pounds dry and provided 30 pounds of nonintegrated flotation compared to the FSBE's 11 pounds and 70-80 pounds of flotation provided by the LPU-34/P life preserver.

The FSBE also beats the CQBE by making the feat of removing the load-bearing vest simple. The new assault kit replaces the previous vest. The assault kit is connected to the FSBE by two connection points and is lighter than the previous system.

The new system also made ground weapons history by providing a respiratory unit to Marines. Previously, Marines in aviation fields used the SRU-40 breathing device. The unit provides Marines with up to two minutes of air.

The SRU-40 and the LPU-34/P were both being used by Marine aviators, which made acquisition easier.

"We had to get this out to the Marines quickly, and looking at items already in our inventory seemed like the most logical first step," said Hoffman.

The only new gear developed was the ballistic vest, according to Hoffman.

A better, safer and easier to use personal battle equipment system has been created for Marine Reconnaissance Units.

LPU can lift a Marine to the surface without ditching any gear," said Hoffman.

Hoffman and his team are currently delivering the equipment to recon units and training the Marines in its use.

The new vest is lighter, provides more protection and is easier to remove than the previous vest.

The vest uses the SAPI Plate which was already fielded Corps-wide with the MOLLE system.

"Another thing we wanted to do was make the new system integrateable with the MOLLE system," said Hoffman. "If the Marine Corps ever decides to use FSBE components Corps-wide, we don't have to go to a whole new system."

The new system allows items such as the MOLLE patrol pack to be easily interchanged.

The FSBE system incorporates a new helmet as well.

The helmet is lighter and stronger than the Kevlar helmet and even floats.

The helmet uses a totally different suspension system than the current helmet, which aids in comfort and impact protection.

Its design allows for better peripheral vision and aids in use of hearing protection and communications equipment.

Though Marines have been waiting eagerly for a new system, the gear is only 50 percent of what they need. The other 50 percent is training, said Hoffman.

Every Marine who receives the new gear is trained extensively through the "walk to run" method, according to Hoffman.

Marines are first shown the gear, and its purpose is explained before being given operation guides. They then perform poolside ditching drills.

The drills are done to ensure Marines can safely perform underwater-egress from helicopter wreckage.

After the poolside drills, Marines use the gear in a pool in sunken-helicopter simulations practicing ditching their gear and safely emerging to the surface.

"The new gear is so much lighter [than CQBE] that the drills are done to ensure Marines can safely perform underwater-egress from helicopter wreckage.

Hoffman and his team are currently delivering the equipment to recon units and training the Marines in its use.

3rd Marine Regiment on line with leadership

Cpl. Roman Yurek
Combat Correspondent

Marine and Navy non-commissioned officers received a chance to fire questions and voice concerns to unit commanders, sergeants major and first sergeants for an entire week to gain insight and knowledge from their senior Marine leadership.

The 3rd Marine Regiment Noncommissioned Officer Symposium, titled "Why We Are Here," began April 17 and concluded Friday.

The course was not only a benefit for the Marines and Sailors, but also for the regiment.

In previous years, the regiment would send four Marines to the 3rd Marine Division NCO Symposium in Okinawa, Japan, at a cost to the regiment of nearly $6000, explained Sgt. Maj. L.L. Harris, 3rd Marine Regiment sergeant major.

Instead of sending Marines to Okinawa this year, the division told the regiment to design their own symposium based on the division's guidelines and classes.

"We (the regiment) mirrored the division with some changes," said Staff Sgt. David Sherman, unit training management chief for the regiment. "The foundation is solid in both, but ours has a couple of twists."

One of the big twists Sherman mentioned was a team from the MCB Hawaii Family Service Center that gave stress management classes and other classes on solving personal problems.

Another class that the service-members attended was on the mission of Navy corpsmen and of accidents and deaths of Marines in vehicles.

Sergeant Josue Santoyo, ordnance chief for H&S Co., 2/3, stands to make a statement on dealing with the personal problems of junior Marines.

Some of the other subjects are hazing, pay and allowances, fitness reports and the responsibilities of NCOs.

These classes give NCOs insight from other NCOs, not just staff NCOs and officers.

"The junior and senior NCOs get to meet one another and find out how other units handle situations," said Sgt. Josue Santoyo, ordnance chief for Headquarters and Service Co., 2/3.

The Marines interacted in small groups to discuss situations, good and bad ways to handle them, and how to fix the problem.

"I get to hear the staff NCOs views on topics and I can make my judgements based on what they look for," said Cpl. Brian Gooden, assistant logistics chief for 2/3. "We listen to their experiences and how they did it, and then we apply it."

Although the symposium was originally intended for only Marines and Sailors from 3rd Marine Regiment, it also included a Marine from the Marine Corps Air Facility. This was the first step to opening the symposium to all the units on base, according to Harris.

On Friday each graduate received two items: a certificate, signed by both the regimental commanding officer and sergeant major, and a symposium coin.

"Educating young Marines and Sailors is our main goal," said Harris. "The course gives a well rounded scope on leadership."

what type of training they receive before going to a unit, Harris said.

"The symposium was great," said Sgt. Gregory Jones, machine gun section leader with Echo Company, 2nd Battalion, 3rd Marine Reg. "It allows junior and senior NCOs a chance to discuss issues amongst one another."

The "well-rounded" open forum also had many classes that dealt with subjects in the Marine Corps. An example of one of those subjects was motor vehicle safety. Harris explained that this class is given due to the amount

K-Bay Dog Team places first in competition

Story and photos by
Sgt. Richard W. Holtgraver
Combat Correspondent

A K-9 team from MCB Hawaii's Provost Marshals Office received a top award at the Department of Defense Canine Trials at Lackland Air Force Base, Texas, last week.

Corporal Shawn C. Gibbons, a canine handler for PMO here and his four-legged partner, Amber, took first place in the tactical obedience category, one of the categories testing both dog and handler.

Other categories in the competition included drug or bomb detection, scouting, handler protection, building search and tactical obedience.

Fifty-eight canine teams from all branches of service, including seven Marine Corps teams, showcased their talents and abilities to perform tasks essential to their missions.

"Tactical obedience is being able to move with your dog in a tactical environment being as quiet as possible," explained Gibbons. "It tests the ability of the handler to control his dog using only hand and arm signals to maneuver over obstacles."

Judges look for the handler's ability to control his dog through the course, and the dog must be able to understand and execute the commands in a certain amount of time.

Gibbons said he and Amber did well overall, but are especially proud of their first-place finish.

Amber, a five-year-old German sheppard, has a track record for winning at canine competitions, Gibbons said.

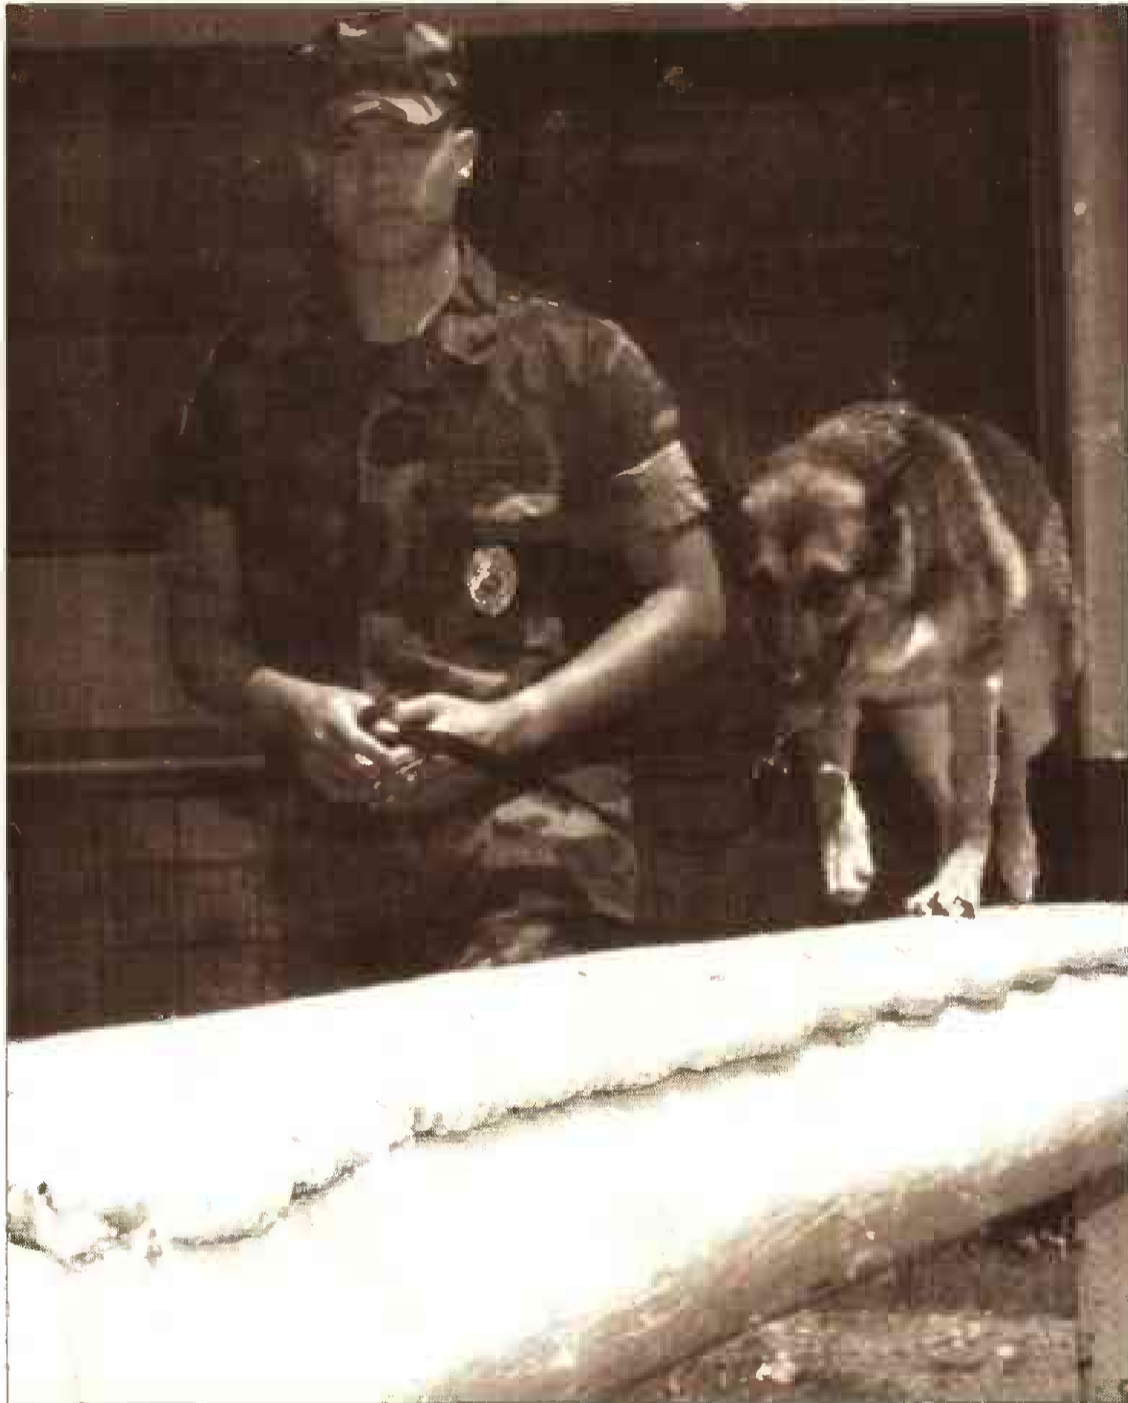

Last year Amber placed second overall at the DOD canine trials.

She also placed first at the Hawaiian state Top Dog competition in 1998 and placed second last year at the same competition.

"She is irreplaceable," said Gibbons. "There are machines out there that are designed to detect drugs and explosives, but they can't be ready at a moment's notice like she can."

Gibbons has worked with Amber for 18 months and their partnership is scheduled to conclude in August.

He said he has enjoyed his time working with and training Amber and knows that her next handler will be getting a seasoned canine veteran who is always ready to perform her mission.

Amber performs the obstacles that won her first place in the DoD K-9 trials last week in San Antonio, Texas..

Climbing up this 7-foot ramp is no easy task for a dog, but with a one word command Amber maneuvers the obstacle with ease.

Accomplishing any obstacle is no problem for Amber, a drug dog for the MCB Hawaii Provost Marshals Office on Kaneohe, shown with her handler, Cpl. Shawn Gibbons. "Irreplaceable" is how Amber is described by Gibbons.

The MCCS Celebrates Children fair held a contest similar to the Nickelodeon network's children's show entitled, "Double Dare." Here, one contestant had to clean another team member's goggles of whipped cream, with only a spray bottle of water, in 30 seconds to score points for his team.

Marine Corps Community Services sponsored a fair at Mokapu Mall Saturday to celebrate Children.

The 'MCCS Celebrates Children Fair' was designed to highlight children in recognition of the Month of the Military Child, Child Abuse Prevention Month, Mokapu Mall's second anniversary and of course, Easter.

A 10 A.M. Easter egg hunt at the Child Development Center started the fun filled day for the kids that lasted until 3 P.M.

Among the list of activities scheduled Saturday were Keltin Chun's Magic Balloon show, self-defense instruction by the Okinawan Kempo-karate School, musical chair competition, the "Brain Drain" teen challenge, and a trivia contest with prizes.

"We pulled all of our resources together to hold this large, one-day event," said Jennifer Sherman, a contracting assistant at MCCS and coordinated the fair's events.

MCCS, the Child Development Center, Personal Services Program and Family Advocacy all worked towards making the celebration fun and informative for families.

"It brought the community together and (got families) out into the community, especially since this was all about the children," said Sherman. "It can be a tough road (being a military family) and this was the perfect way to celebrate that."

Entertainment for children wasn't the only service provided at the MCCS Celebrates Children Fair. There was a car seat safety checkpoint and information booths set up by Family Advocacy, Red Cross and travel agencies.

Also in attendance at the fair were Aloha and Mahalo, a pair of dolphin mascots, and the Easter bunny made a guest appearance before his busiest day of the year.

"There has been a lot of good information given here, especially in dealing with children," said Corporal Hubauer a military policeman with Headquarters Battalion Provost Marshal Office.

Hubauer took his wife, Veronica, and two children, Dillon and Victoria to the fair.

"I hope everyone had a good time, especially the children, because that's who we were here for today," said Sherman. "Doing (activities) like this reminds us to take care of them now. They are our future."

Far Right - The Marine Corps Exchange dolphin mascot persuades a young child to give him him a hug.

Marine Corps Exchange dolphin Mascots, Aloha and Mahalo, pose for a picture with Ahkel Key, Keyanah Key and Katell Key. Aloha and Mahalo spent their day at the fair posing for pictures, hugging children and passing out candy.

The suspense is on. A contestant waits for his team member to clean his goggles from a far.

Boxing Club looking for a few good boxers

Cpl. Charles E. Moore
Combat Correspondent

It's time to step into the ring. The Kaneohe boxing club is looking for you. "We're looking for people interested in competing so we can fill a team (for upcoming competitions)," said Felix Cazares, head coach.

The boxing program aboard MCB Hawaii, Kaneohe Bay is about a year old. Cazares has been coaching here for more than six months, and although he doesn't have much time under his belt, he knows his stuff.

Cazares said he grew up boxing, and even boxed professionally for a while. After he quit boxing, he became a certified U.S. Amateur Boxing Association coach. He even went through the Olympic Training School in Colorado Springs, where he became an internationally certified, level-three boxing coach, which is the second highest certification level a coach can attain. He is currently one of three level-three coaches in Hawaii.

His qualifications allowed him to become Hawaii's Golden Glove amateur boxing head coach in 1997. This is quite a feat and honor because he said Hawaii boasts a really good amateur boxing program.

In Hawaii, competitions run about once a month, allowing boxers plenty of opportunities to demonstrate their skill and prowess in the ring.

Boxers can have the chance to do this in front of one of the largest boxing crowds in Hawaii if they choose to compete at Bayfest, as more than 2,000 spectators watch on.

But if a boxer isn't ready, or doesn't want to compete in any event, that's no problem.

"I try to encourage them if they've got potential," said Cazares. "But it's up to them if they want to compete."

Even if someone doesn't want to compete, they can still reap many benefits from boxing.

"It's a good way to kill some energy and stay in shape," said Kevin Lusk, a boxer here. "It's also a great way to let out aggression."

Boxing offers a great cardio-vascular and strength-building work-out.

If a boxer isn't in great shape, he'll be out of breath before the end of the first round, Cazares explained.

The program allows Cazares to work his boxers up to the point where they can last the entire match, and maybe even win.

Cazares isn't only looking for experienced boxers. His program also caters to people who have never boxed before.

Cazares encourages anybody to come out, even if they're unsure whether or not they're going to like boxing.

He even offers a free-trial to all beginners.

"I usually allow beginners to train two or three days for free," Cazares said. "If they don't like it, they don't have to pay."

That is how Lusk started boxing. He said one night in January, he stopped by the boxing gym with a friend to see what it was all about. He's been boxing ever since.

"I've always wanted to box," he said. "It just feels like something I can do."

Boxing is open to all active duty military, retired personnel, dependents and DoD civilians. Interested personnel and potential teammates should contact Cazares at 263-4026.

Clean-up keeps K-Bay out of the net

Cpl. Charles E. Moore
 Combat Correspondent

The waters of Kaneohe Bay may look a little bluer, thanks to the Base Environmental Department, Waterfront Operations and 4th Force Reconnaissance Co. from MCB Hawaii, Kaneohe Bay.

Marines, Sailors and civilians from these departments participated in a reef clean-up April 20 that coincided with Earth Day.

The K-Bay units worked hand in hand with state and federal agencies to clear the bay reefs of fishing nets and other trash. Workers found everything from tires to bottles, and nets to boxes, said Navy Senior Chief Petty Officer Gerard Kalani, assistant officer in charge of Waterfront Operations. The nets and debris collected weighed more than 2,000 lbs.

The yearly event is designed to keep the nets and other trash from damaging the reefs and becoming an environmental hazard, he said. The fishing nets were particularly searched for.

The nets come from all over. Some are long illegal fishing nets that are torn from boats. Others are nets that have been dropped and forgotten, or have drifted away. Once they get to the reef, they all have one thing in common: they are damaging to the delicate reef environment.

Just because a fishing net is no longer attached to the boat, doesn't mean it quits catching fish. The nets get caught on the reef and continue trapping fish. Unable to swim freely, the fish quickly die.

Debris also gets caught in the net and chisels away at the reef as the tides ebb and flow. The K-Bay units sought to eliminate all the fishing nets from the reefs.

The involved agencies spent three weeks preparing for the clean-up. They carefully plotted and marked all the nets they found and went out after them during low-tide on the day of the clean-up. All in all, four Waterfront Operation boats, one state boat and two zodiac boats, went into the bay in search of the marked nets and any new nets to clear.

Throughout the clean-up, there was an inherent risk of danger. Some parts of the reef are so fragile that they could not support the weight of a person, Kalani said. If the reef collapsed or broke, it could trap a worker underneath the water. Fortunately for everyone involved, no one was hurt.

At the end of the day, the mission was considered successful, Kalani said.

"It's our way to say we support the community," he said.

Collected debris awaits disposal after the annual Kaneohe Bay clean-up. Base Environmental Dept., Waterfront Operations, and the 4th Force Reconnaissance Co., and state and federal agencies participated recently in shoring up knarled, old, abandoned fishing nets on K-Bay's reef.
