Army, joint forces conduct vital 'hot range' training in Africa

DJIBOUTI CITY, Djibouti – In military terminology, "the range is hot" is a warning that weapons are currently authorized to fire on a training range. This term has dual meaning here for military members, who are no strangers to the brutal heat of the training ranges located in the mountains along the Gulf of Tadjoura's southern coast.

This arid locale requires rigorous planning in advance of exercises. U.S. Marine Corps Staff Sgt. Neil Loaiza, Combined Joint Task Force - Horn of Africa, has the responsibility of coordinating the use of the ranges between all U.S. service branches and international partners.

Loaiza explained that the Djiboutian military has allowed its international partners to use these mountain ranges as a training site for many years.

"The French first established the training sites," said Loaiza. "Today, the ranges are very active, used by both U.S. forces and international partners who seek to train, qualify and sustain their qualifications on a variety of weapons systems."

The area has become a valuable asset to the melting pot of militaries in Djibouti, offering a suitable site for joint exercises and multinational training opportunities.

However, the site is not without its challenges. Safely navigating the rocky terrain to and from the ranges is always a priority. Vast areas of black volcanic stone limit vehicle transport options. The rocky dirt paths carved out by vehicle traffic are often washed away by brief flash floods. Rocks have punctured tires and steep inclines have proven difficult to navigate. The logistics of moving troops and equipment out to the range is a training experience within itself.
