CBIRF Conducts Certification Exercise Aboard NSF Dahlgren, NSF Indian Head

By Lance Cpl. Maverick S. Mejia, CBIRF Public Affairs Office

Marines and sailors with Initial Response Force, IRF B, Chemical Biological Incident Response Force, CBIRF, U.S. Marine Corps Forces Command, participated in a certification exercise, CERTEX, which included a simulated chemical attack and a sling load operation aboard Naval Support Facilities Indian Head Annex Stump Neck, Md., and Dahlgren, Va., Dec. 13, 2016.

This CERTEX evaluated all capabilities of the IRF including identification and detection, technical rescue, decontamination, search and rescue/casualty extraction, medical, explosive ordnance disposal, as well as command and control to better inform the commanding officer how quickly and effectively IRF

B is able to respond to a chemical, biological radiological, nuclear and high-yield explosive, CBRNE, device threats.

CBIRF is widely considered the Nation's premier chemical, biological, radiological, nuclear and high-yield explosives, CBRNE, response force. When directed, CBIRF forward-deploys and/or responds with minimal warning to a chemical, biological, radiological, nuclear or high-yield explosive (CBRNE) threat or event in order to assist local, state, or federal agencies and the geographic combatant commanders.

This exercise brought in CBIRF Headquarters & Service assets such as embarkation specialist with Logistics Platoon and Marines with Motor

NSASP Takes Second Place in NDW Energy Biggest Loser Competition

By Barbara Wagner South Potomac Pilot

For the second year in a row, Naval Support Activity South Potomac (NSASP) has placed in the Naval District Washington's (NDW) annual Energy Biggest Loser (EBL) competition resulting in a cash award. NSASP Energy Manager Kathryn Simpson is excited, pleased and determined to continue "energizing" both Naval Support Facility (NSF) Dahlgren and NSF Indian Head to be more cognizant of their collective energy usage and find ways to be more energy efficient.

The EBL competition pitted installations against each other to see which could reduce overall energy consumption during the months of September and October. Energy usage was tallied monthly and compared to August usage to determine which installation exhibited the greatest reduction percentage.

This is the second such annual competition and NSASP has held steady at a respectable second place.

One of the factors that helped push NSASP over this year was the fact that Joint Interoperability Test Command (JITC) building was temporarily vacant — JITC was still up and running, the number of computers and lamps, for example, were no longer drawing current.

"The people in the buildings -that's what drives the energy [consumption]," Simpson said. "I think that's what a lot of people don't realize; they think they don't make a difference in a building, what folks do with their lights, and what folks do with their computers... it does make a difference."

Simpson gave an example of a table-top lamp on her work desk that now uses an LED light bulb.

"In the grand scheme of the Navy, — that [one bulb] doesn't make a big difference," Simpson explained. "But if a bunch of us do that, it does."

NSASP took second place, coming in behind larger Naval Air Station (NAS) Patuxent River. The latter reduced its consumption by 24.8 percent this year, a substantial increase from its total reduction last year of 6.2 percent. NSASP's reduction this year totaled 18.4 percent, also much improved from its reduction last year.

"In America, we've grown accustomed to lights turning on when we flip a switch and our appliances working when they are turned on, we may have a tendency to think of energy as an unlimited resource. It only takes a quick read of the local newspaper or evening news to know that is not the case and we must all work hard to secure our future energy resources," NSASP Commanding Officer Mary Feinberg said.

Also awarded aboard NSASP was Naval Surface Warfare Center (NSWC) Dahlgren Division Facilities Manager Sam Thompson, who was recognized as the Best Building Energy Monitors (BEM) on the installation.

According to the Commander, Navy Installations Command (CNIC) web page on the Navy shore energy program, energy bills are the single largest

Story Time with Santa at Dahlgren Library – A Holly Jolly Time Had by All

By Barbara Wagner
South Potomac Pilot

Santa Claus made his annual appearance at the Dahlgren Library to spend some quality one-on-one time with the children of Naval Support Facility (NSF) Dahlgren. Even little seven-month-olds did not escape the watchful eye of the man who knows who's naughty and nice, and Santa made sure to stop to speak to all of the little ones—garnering high fives and hugs, along with a few shy smiles from the youngsters who weren't so sure about the jolly man in the jingling red suit.

The children were thrilled to have a few moments with Santa to talk about how they had behaved over the past year. Santa reminded them of the importance of proper dental hygiene, picking up their toys, listening to the parents and in some cases being kinder to their baby brothers!

Dahlgren Library staff was prepared for Santa's dropping in at story time with an array of frosted and chocolate chip cookies and juice boxes for the little ones. Crafts were also available for those who were interested, including festive foam picture frames for the children to put together and some enjoyable holiday coloring.

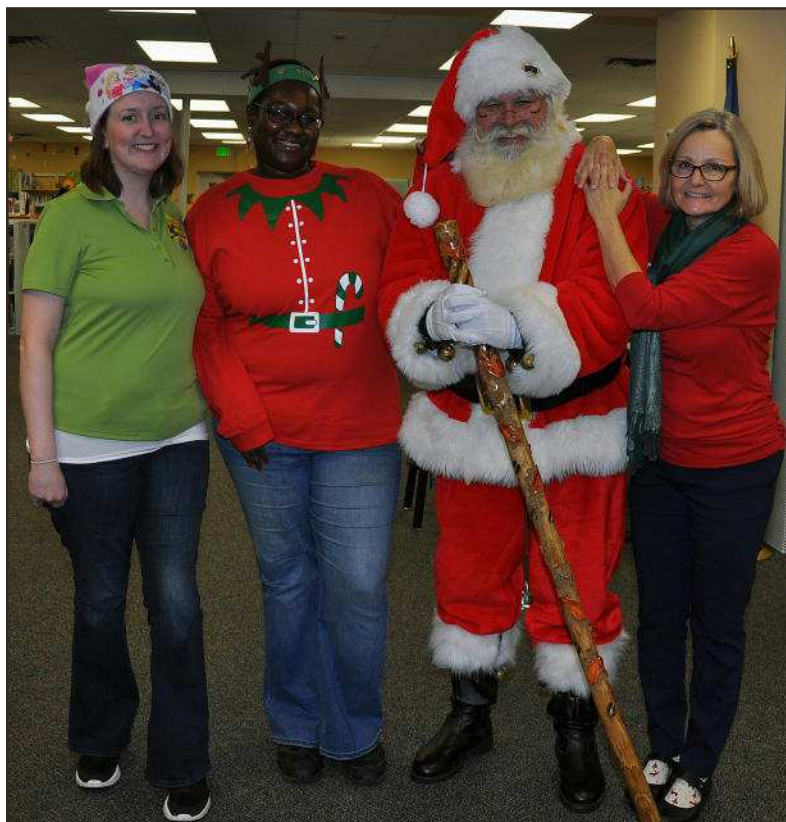

U.S. NAVY PHOTOS BY BARBARA WAGNER

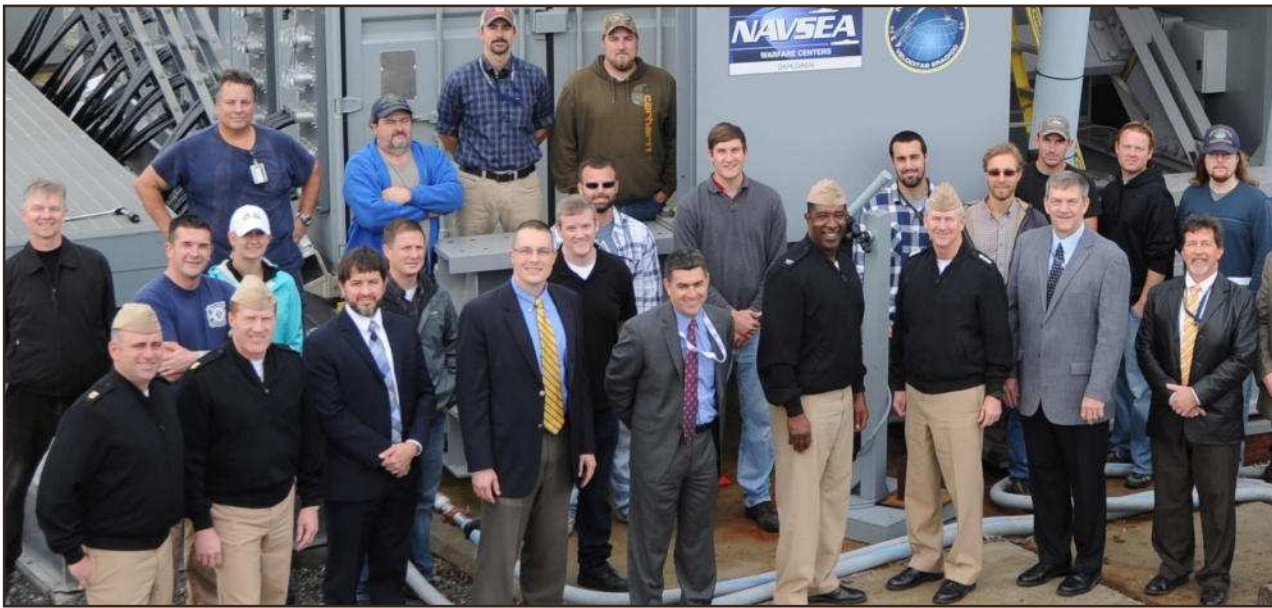

After a bit of one-on-one chat time with Kris Kringle himself, the children settled in to hear Santa read them a few stories about his favorite time of the year. Having sat as patiently as possible and listened to Santa share tales of winter holidays, the little ones were able to have a picture taken with Santa Claus to put in their newly-crafted picture frames.

For the more than 50 families in attendance, story time with Santa created special memories and provided an afternoon filled with happy times for all.

NAVSEA Commander Visits NSWC Dahlgren

U.S. NAVY PHOTOS BY PATRICK DUNN

Vice Adm. Thomas Moore, NAVSEA commander, loads an electromagnetic railgun projectile into the electromagnetic railgun during his visit to the NSWCDD, Nov. 30. Electromagnetic railgun technology uses an electromagnetic force to rapidly accelerate and launch a projectile between two conductive rails. The guided projectile is launched at such high velocities that it can achieve greater ranges than conventional guns. It harnesses enough kinetic energy that it doesn't require any kind of high explosive payload when it reaches its target.

Ben McGlasson, NSWCDD electromagnetic railgun technical director, briefs Vice Adm. Thomas Moore, commander of the Naval Sea Systems Command, on the electromagnetic railgun autoloader during Moore's visit to NSWCDD, Nov. 30.

costs for Navy installations, accounting for roughly 28 percent of the Navy's shore budget, which is itself a substantial share of the overall budget.

Navy's stance on cultural and behavioral impacts on energy found at the www.greenfleet.dodlive.mil website, indicates that the Navy is seeking to change the energy culture aboard both installations and at sea by linking energy consumption to behavior through awareness and accountability at the individual, command and functional level. The EBL competition is one way to substantially reach all three levels with one act.

"The results of the second annual NDW Energy's Biggest Loser show that the employees of NSA South Potomac take saving energy seriously and they are concerned with the future we will leave for our children and grandchildren," Feinberg stated. "I encourage everyone to do their part, both at home and work for future generations to come."

CBIRF

Transport Platoon and UH-60M Blackhawks from U.S. Army's 12th Aviation Battalion located at Fort Belvoir, Va., for a special sling load operation making this exercise a multi-service operation.

IRF B was given the task to detect and identify the cause of what seemed to be a chemical attack said Erick Swartz, senior scientist with CBIRF. After the identification of a nerve agent Marines from Extraction Platoon quickly extricated simulated victims trapped inside an office building while remaining on the alert for any improvised explosive devices, IED's.

"Marines with Identification and Detection Platoon were able to narrow down the chemical threat to a nerve agent which caused temporary blindness and seizure-like symptoms," said Sgt. Augustine Romero, operations chief for IRF B.

"This exercise posed unique challenges to the IRF," said Romero. "The IRF was in need of more supplies."

As part of the simulated attack, in partnership with 12th Aviation Battalion, logistics Marines conducted a sling load operation to simulate a re-supply push package from NSF Indian Head Stump Neck Annex to NSF Dahlgren via UH-60M Blackhawk helicopter.

This sling load operation served two purposes, said Romero. It allowed the IRF to accomplish a more complex mission over a longer than usual working time and provides all around training for embarkation, motor transport and engineer Marines.

"The sling load training is an important asset to an IRF as it provides a more expedited way of transport to be able to resupply the IRF with items such as more medicine, or more equipment to get the mission accomplished," said Sgt. Joshua Davenport, a team leader with Logistics Platoon, CBIRF.

"Whether CBIRF responds to a natural disaster or an explosion of sorts, aerial transport might be the only option. This type of training helps build stronger relations with the 12th Aviation Battalion," added Davenport. "It is important for different branches to train together to better serve when needed."

Training to transport needed materials using other services' assets is realistic because when CBIRF is tasked to respond it will more than likely be within the command structure of a Joint Task Force. In that scenario, it is very likely that CBIRF would coordinate with units like 12th Aviation Battalion for logistics support.

"CBIRF's response was a success," said Romero. "If this would have been a real life scenario we would definitely have saved lives."
