Obama urges US to work together

American Forces Press Service

WASHINGTON - As President Barack Obama, commander in chief, called on Americans to work together to overcome the crises facing the nation, he urged them not to forget military members defending the nation overseas in his inaugural address, Tuesday, on the National Mall here.

"As we consider the road that unfolds before us, we remember with humble gratitude those brave Americans who, at this very hour, patrol far-off deserts and distant mountains," Obama said shortly after taking the oath of office.

On the west side of the Capitol, between 1 and 2 million people gathered to watch the inaugural address of the 44th president.

The president ticked off the challenges facing the United States.

"Our nation is at war against a far-reaching network of violence and hatred," he said. "Our economy is badly weakened, a consequence of greed and irresponsibility on the part of some, but also our collective failure to make hard choices and prepare the nation for a new age.

"Today I say to you that the challenges we face are real," he continued. "They are serious, and they are many. They will not be met easily or in a short span of time. But know this, America ... they will be met.'

In his address, Obama echoed Abraham Lincoln's first inaugural speech. Just as Lin- cious gift, that noble idea passed on from SCHOFIELD BARRACKS - Parents quieted children and took their seats at the Sgt. Smith Theater here, Tuesday night, as Lt. Col. Mark Boussy, commander, U.S. Army Garrison (USAG)-Oahu, began the Oahu North town hall meeting.

The meeting provided the community with updates on security and housing, and information regarding upcoming events. Subject matter experts presented information on the status of ongoing and finished projects, what families can expect in the future, and activities for families of deployed Soldiers.

Directorate of Emergency Services Deputy Director Sam Barton explained the curfew policy and stated the curfew for children under age 13 is 9 p.m. to 6 a.m., and teenagers 14 to 17 years old are required to be indoors between 11 p.m. and 5:30 a.m.

Barton also informed the audience of a 56 percent increase in property crimes within the last 90 days and urged community members to secure personal property. Pilfered high-value electronic items have also been reported on numerous occasions. Barton said marking items and noting the serial number can aid greatly in the item's retrieval should it be

The Juvenile Review Board meets monthly and consists of numerous organizations, including School Liaison, Family Life Chaplain and Army Community Service. Through the program, juvenile offenders "repay their debts" by performing community service and writing essays. Offenders may get limited debarment from the installation in the most severe cases.

School Liaison Officer Wayne Yoshino responded to recent concerns regarding overcrowding in many schools across the installation. Yoshino said the Department of Education (DoE) runs public schools, and the Department of Defense is not in a position to dictate conditions. However, Army representatives and the DoE have met to discuss ways they can address the situation. Once the DoE has decided on a plan of action, the Army has expressed that it will provide support, as needed, to make the solution a success.

Green issues, housing take center stage

SCHOFIELD BARRACKS - As we look back at the year that has passed, the Army's dedication to serving personnel and families continues to shine through green initiatives, upgraded housing and beautification efforts across our installations. 2008 brought great change to U.S. Army Garrison-Hawaii (USAG-HI) and the population it supports. Through continued relationships and communication between commands and the community, the garrison has consistently made progress.

Going green

As everyone was painfully aware, 2008 was a year of soaring energy and fuel costs. This fact had a profound effect on the garrison, as well, which spent more than $62 million on electricity alone in 2008, $14 million more than bud-

"This forced USAG-HI to take money that would have gone toward planned programs, infra-structure and quality of life improvements and redirect it to paying our energy bill," said Col. Matthew Margotta, USAG-HI commander. "Partially in response to this, increased sustainability efforts became not only a goal, but a ne-Margotta modified the USAG-

HI mission, linking green initiatives throughout all goals and strategies, and continued to promote a sustainable culture within the garrison.

He also conducted three sustainability planning-working conferences, establishing and identifying specific and achievable goals for sustainability. Of the 74 goals identified, 14 have been achieved, including hiring a sustainability coordinator, establishing a garrison sustainability Web site, and ensuring all future construction projects are designed to LEED (Leadership in Energy and Environmental Design) standards.

More initiatives are in the works,

Foot Soldier honors are always deserved

RETIRED MAJ. GEN. JERRY A. WHITE National Infantry Museum and Soldier Center

COLUMBUS, Ga. - I resolve to honor the American infantry Soldier in 2009, and I hope you will join me. It's a promise we hardly had to make 12 months ago when such admirable young people were all over

Indeed, every year is comprised of what journalists call "story arcs." Some topic becomes all the rage for a few months, dominating opinion pages, blogs, magazine covers and TV news programs. In 2008, such arcs included home prices, the Tampa Bay Rays, economic stimulus checks, the iPhone, gasoline prices, Barack Obama and the financial crisis.

January 2008 was the first anniversary of President Bush's "surge," in which five additional combat brigades were sent to Iraq. That development helped make the American Soldier the first story arc of the new year.

Reporting focused on combat missions, videos of firefights, blog posts from the front and dozens of stories about tearful reunions with family and friends back in the States as tours of duty concluded. For a while, the nation was clearly attentive to the dedication and courage of the military men and women de voted to protecting and projecting American ideals.

Then the arc faded. It always does.

The presidential primaries experienced their own surge, and the spotlight of national focus moved on to other things. But Soldiers kept fighting and sacrificing in a manner that befits a long and proud tradition.

George Orwell wrote, "People sleep peaceably in their beds at night only because rough men stand ready to do violence on their behalf.'

In spite of historical episodes of unfathomably resilient personal character, the valor of the Army infantryman often has been insufficiently recognized.

Consider, 80 percent of U.S. armed forces casualties have been from the infantry. More than half of the 3,467 Medals of Honor awarded since the Civil War have gone to infantrymen. No war in the history of the world has been won without infantry. Regardless of the remarkable advances in military hardware, armor, tactics, intelligence and weapons technology, the foot Soldier has endured as the simply indispensable element of every winning force.

There are individual war heroes, of course, but collectively, perhaps, the greatest hero is the infantry itself - the legions of anonymous patriots whom history does not record but whose commitment is crucial to the achievements of our country. We can all commit ourselves to acknowledge the contributions of these brave souls who have committed their youth, their intelligence, their devotion and, sometimes, their very lives to the progress and propagation of

So this year, mount a flag in your yard, cook a meal for the family of a serving Soldier, thank a veteran in your neighborhood, be visibly appreciative and proud of our fighting forces.

Honoring Soldiers is not synonymous with glorifying war. These fine young people serve regardless of their own ideology and political predilections. They serve because they consider it their duty to do so. That rare ethos is worthy of praise because, regardless of all other considerations, they

Moral muscle gets workout during difficult challenges

CHAPLAIN (CAPT.) NATHAN P. MCLEAN

As Winston Churchill observed Britain's leaders in his day, he said he was saddened to find that "physical courage was so prevalent while moral courage was so rare. I believe if Churchill were alive today, he may likely arrive at the same conclusion. While we struggle with different problems and challenges in modern society, many of the same issues Churchill faced still Obviously, we see Soldiers use physical courage every day. Just being a Soldier evokes a form of physical courage because we put our physical selves at risk. However, physical courage isn't the only kind of courage required of us. There is also the kind of courage where we are morally challenged. Moral challenges usually aren't as simple as physical challenges. Moral challenges deal with the messy complexities of life, and they even force us to face our deepest fears.

We are left grasping for answers, and in our desperation, we come to see that we are controlled by our fears – whether it is the fear of loss, rejection, isolation, abandonment, betrayal, or our fear that we won't measure up to expectations.

Each of us has something to gain from increased moral courage, and these victories begin at home

I continue to speak with Soldiers, spouses and their families who struggle in their relationships, and I continue to find that they have seldom experienced the intimacy for which they have often hungered.

Why? Well, relationships cause us to get a little messy at times because any mature relationship or the simple realities, but the difficult truths life brings. The only way to manage life through the difficult realities is to have the courage to face those difficult truths.

One of the definitions of sin visible in the Old Testament rises far above the mere idea of superficially doing certain actions and not doing others. Rather, sin is defined as "shrinking back" in a time of adversity. The term was used for individuals or groups that, when faced with difficult times, lacked the courage of faith to push through or face difficulty.

My encouragement is for you to understand that when you face the harsh realities in life, realize you are being tested. Begin to exercise those muscles of moral courage through relationships at home and at work. Grow through some of the chaos by starting new Listen and respond with kindness and consideration. Forgive another family member who has wronged and injured you. Stand for what you hold be right and true and proper, even though you may not be taken seriously. These are all ways we can exercise moral courage.

Leaders must have the highest of integrity to face challenges, but I have found that moral competency is one of the more difficult acts for Soldiers in the home, as well. I have also found that moral failure in the home continues to exist, not so much because we do not know what to do, but rather because we lack the courage to face the unknown.

CUSTOMER MANAGEMENT SERVICES

More people showed up at the Battle Command Training Center, Jan. 12, than she had expected, but U.S. Army Garrison-Hawaii (USAG-HI) customer service officer Ophelia Isreal didn't mind.

"I ran out of handouts, but that's good." Isreal said. She had just facilitated an informational meeting of the newly established Installation Action Council (IAC), a garrison program that allows community representatives to discuss and prioritize community issues.

The IAC is a component of Community FIRST (Feedback, Issues, Resolutions, Solutions, Today), an issue-resolution process that collects issues and recommendations from the community via focus groups, surveys and issue sheet collection.

The issues are then forwarded to the appropriate service provider for action. Issues that can't easily be resolved at the provider level will be brought to the IAC for discussion and prioritization for the garrison.

mmander addresses challenges in Iraq

Stars and Stripes, Mideast Edition

TIKRIT, Iraq - The U.S.'s recently installed command team faces many military, civil and economic challenges in trying to further stabilize and provide security for upcoming elections in the ethnically mixed northern half of Iraq.

Dec. 9, Maj. Gen. Robert Caslen took over command of Multinational Division (MND)-North, which covers almost all of Iraq north of Baghdad — an area the size of Ohio that includes seven provinces, three international borders, even more contentious ethnic borders, and where Sunnis Shiites and Kurds struggle for control.

The region also includes Kirkuk, an oil-

Turkmen.

In an interview, Caslen, soft-spoken with graying hair, discussed the future of MND-North, saying it will be a challenge to meet his number one goal, maintaining security gains that have led to a reduction in violence in much of the region over the past year.

The most immediate issue Caslen must deal with is security for the Jan. 31 provin-

It includes the provincial capital of Baqouba, once claimed by al-Qaida in Iraq as its

"To Iran, Diyala is the bridge between Iran and Sadr City, Baghdad (the stronghold of anti-U.S. cleric Muqtada al-Sadr)," Caslen said. "To the central government, Diyala is the buffer between a Kurdish incursion, and to the Shia (Sunni-dominated), Divala is a relic of (Saddam's regime)." In the far north of Iraq is Mosul, one of the country's most unsettled cities, where bombings are still common and there is still, Caslen said, "a viable insurgency." In November, an Iraqi army soldier opened fire on U.S. forces, killing two American Soldiers. Despite the shooting, Caslen said U.S. and Iraqi security forces are still working side-by-side in this city of two million people.

"The security situation in Mosul is still very tenuous, so we find the Iraqi police to be having a tough time," he said, "but they are very brave and are doing the best they can.

Meanwhile, the fate of Kirkuk is still in limbo. The majority is Kurd, but with large minorities of Arabs and Turkmen, a long hoped-for referendum whether Kirkuk will become part of Kurdistan or be under central government control still hasn't happened.

"Although there is generally calm in Kirkuk city, it can flash in a minute," Caslen said.

Caslen said U.S. forces can act as a gobetween for different groups contesting Kirkuk and the vast oil reserves that lie under its desolate landscape.

"The good news is this - in all of these situations, not only the military but the political leaders are talking, and we in the coalition are involved in mediating those

"I take personal pride in what my Soldiers do," he said. "My job is to talk to them and mentor them. It's great to know that I have a hand in shaping their successes. If they are successful, that means I am successful."

Sweigart received his commission eight years ago after graduating from the U.S. Military Academy at West Point in New York. He followed in the footsteps of his father and grandfather who also served in the military.

"It is something I always wanted to do," he said. "I saw them serve proudly and that is a tradition I wanted to continue.

Sweigart deployed in support of Operation Iraqi Freedom with the 2nd Stryker Brigade Combat Team in December 2007. Since the unit's arrival, he said he has BAGHDAD — Tribal leaders, council members, Iraqi workers and engineers, and members of the Baghdad Water Authority gathered in the Adhamiyah district of Baghdad to witness the official opening of the Sadr City Rusafa Water Treatment Facility, Wednesday.

U.S. Ambassador Ryan Crocker thanked the crowd of approximately 200 guests for the opportunity to open the facility he said would help shape the future of Baghdad and Iraq.

"This is truly a strategic project," Crocker said. "It provides 96,000 cubic meters of water to Baghdad per day, and the United States of America is proud and pleased to have financed this project and to see it through to completion with our close friends and our partners in the mayoralty and the government."

The facility, completed in October at a cost of $65 million, took three years to complete. It provides 4,000 cubic meters of fresh water per hour to northeastern Baghdad, to include 27 sectors of Sadr City.

"This project is the most important, and probably the biggest project for Sadr City," said Baghdad mayor, Navet Al Essawi. "This project and others like it will clear the path of terrorism."

The facility has been providing potable water to Sadr City and the surrounding areas for more than three months. The ceremony served not only to demonstrate a return of essential services to the region but as a symbol of closure for people in an area who had been marred by violence for so long, said Maj. Brian Horine, civil military operations officer, 3rd Infantry Brigade Combat Team, who assisted with the ceremony.

"This opening is about what the Government of Iraq has done for the people. This facility was started more than two years ago when Sadr City was in the height of bad times," said Horine. "Today, security and stability (have) returned, allowing this to happen."

The mayor thanked coalition forces for their help and guidance in making the new facility a realization and said the project was the first part of a five-step strategic plan for Baghdad.

Horine echoed the mayor's words, explaining that the facility's opening is just a start to many equally important projects soon to be completed, such as an electric substation not far from the Rusafa Water Treatment Facility, which will distribute reliable power to Sadr City.

The mayor assured the audience that the Baghdad government and the Government of Iraq are committed to the people.

"The people of Sadr City and their neighbors have suffered from a water deficiency for 10 years. Now they can rest and be secure that they have someone to look after them," Al Essawi said.

ISTAQLAL, Iraq — As a 15-month deployment comes to a close, several "Wolfhounds" are literally running against time to make it to the finish.

Soldiers assigned to the 1st Battalion, 27th Infantry Regiment "Wolfhounds," have formed a club that motivates them to run laps around Joint Security Station (JSS) Istaqlal in an effort to fight to the finish.

"This was a spur of the moment idea," said Capt. Brian Sweigart, commander, Headquarters and Headquarters Company, on how the club formed. "It was an idea that was thought of when we were sitting around the table.

"We set an achievable goal in our short time remaining in Iraq," continued Sweigart, who is one of the original five runners who started counting laps, Nov. 11.

He added said that 127 laps around JSS Istaqlal was a good number, as it represents the unit.

"We have a large area to run," said Sgt. Timothy Miller, infantry team leader in A Co. "Each lap is (three quarters) of a mile long."

"More than 50 percent of the course is covered with gravel and large rocks, which makes it difficult to run on," continued Miller, who is also one of the original club members. "It's like running in the sand on the beach."

The challenge of running 127 laps around the JSS was completed first by Sgt. 1st Class Nathanial Hanrahan, an infantryman with A Co.

Hanrahan didn't stop at 127 laps, though. He recently completed 170 laps, the equivalent of running more than 127-miles, since Nov. 11.

women, they are the second IP class drawn from former SoI to graduate from the academy. Last month, the graduating class of 1,031 IPs included 19 female Shurta.

"These two graduations are tangible proof that the government of Iraq has kept its promise. It offered Iraqi police jobs and training to former Sons of Iraq in recognition of their service," said Maj. Gen. Khadim, provincial directorate of police for Baghdad, through an interpreter. "We will continue to extend a salute of respect and partnership to those who wish to serve with us."

Registration has begun for the next class of IP candidates, who will begin training before the end of January. Early indications point to another history-making class, which is expected to include nearly 500 female recruits.

"This transition of Sons of Iraq into the Iraqi police is a visible sign of reconciliation," said Col. Byron Freeman, commander, 8th Military Police Brigade. "Every graduation like today's is a clear sign of progress. This Numbering 894 men and three effectively heals sectarian conflict with a sought-after job."

'Bountyhunters,' Iraqi Security Forces clean up streets of Sab al Bour

Small things like clean streets source of pride for city residents, drastically improve quality of life

JOINT SECURITY STATION SAB AL BOUR, Iraq -Cleaning up the streets of Sab al Bour is a priority for

To help get that mission done, Soldiers from B Troop "Bountyhunter," 2nd Squadron, 14th Cavalry Regiment, along with Iraqi police (IP), assisted local sanitation workers with the distribution of trash cans along two of the busiest market streets in Sab al Bour, Jan. 13-14.

A total of 500 trash cans were signed over from the local city officials to individual shop owners during the two-day span.
"I am proud of this," said Iraq police Pvt. Majeed, an IP assigned to the Sab al Bour IP station. "I live here and am so very proud of our clean streets.

Since the trash cans are the property of the Iraqi government, shop owners were briefed extensively on their responsibilities. Shop owners were required to sign for the cans from both city officials and the Bountyhunter Troop. Additionally, shop owners will be held liable for any damage or theft.

Store owners agreed to place the cans outside their establishments during the day and secure them indoors at night, thus mitigating the risk of damage or theft.

The cans, which are color coded by district, represent the first step in the implementation of the new Sab al Bour sanitation program, which includes scheduled days for trash pickup by the city's five new

"Sab al Bour has become a very successful city and cleaning up the streets will only make it better," said Sgt. 1st Class Brian Chavez, a platoon sergeant for Bountyhunter troop. "By the second day, we could already see a noticeable improvement.'

These small things are drastically improving the quality of life for residents in the city.

"Life in Sab al Bour is improving every day," said Capt. Dan Digati, commander, Bountyhunter troop. ALEXANDRIA, Va. -Audie Murphy, the most decorated U.S. combat warrior of World War II, suffered from insomnia and depression, was diagnosed with post-traumatic stress disorder (PTSD, then called "battle fatigue"), committed domestic violence and became addicted to sleeping pills, which he later overcame.

Murphy was never considered a weak human. He spoke candidly about his problems to help Korean and Vietnam War veterans and urged Congress to pass legislation to extend health care benefits to address PTSD and other mental and behavioral health problems for returning veterans.

The positive changes for which he fought are being implemented, most recently in the form of Warrior Adventure Quest (WAQ).

In 2003, behavioral health professionals with the Mental Health Advisory Team (MHAT) began conducting surveys with Soldiers and Marines about battlefield ethics.

By September 2006, these behavioral health professionals, now known as MHAT IV, deployed to Iraq and surveyed Soldiers, Marines, health care providers and chaplains. "This team," said retired Maj. Gen. Gale Pollock, former acting surgeon general of the Army, "found that deployment length and family separation were the top noncombat deployment issues for Soldiers, whereas Marines had fewer noncombat deployment issues, probably because of their shorter deployment outreach efforts to focus on units that are in theater ing on the highways, resulting in an incredible longer than six months, and determined that shorter deployments or longer intervals between deployments would allow Soldiers and Marines better opportunities to reset mentally before returning to Things began to move.

Carol Potter, former senior program analyst with the FMWR Policy Office, and Dan Reinhard, from the Defense Safety Oversight Council (DSOC), present-

"The concept of Return and Recreate came about because the Soldiers, who live with adrenaline pumping through their veins during war, come back to the U.S., look around and say, 'is that all there is?' when they return," Potter said.

"We found that, in order to maintain that euphoric high," Potter said, "many Soldiers safely returning from combat (are) left ... feeling invincible. As a consequence, they turned to drugs, alcohol and speed-number of accidents and deaths. In the proposal, I suggested to the Army (that) high adventure could be offered to help Soldiers achieve that adrenaline thrill in a healthier manner."

A group from Outdoor Recreation put together a proposal suggesting that "if Soldiers are looking for adrenaline, then we should give it to them" in a skill learning" (more controlled) environment. This new skill would be an introduction to a new lifetime leisure activity that they might use as an alternative method of blowing off steam and releas-

Although death could result from high adventure activities, it was reasoned by the group that death and serious injury were more likely to result in a car crash or motorcycle crash than while learning to run the bumps on skis; shred the powder on a snowboard; run the single-track on a mountain bike; climb a 60-foot high, 5.8 route on a cliff face; or

The pace of change picked up again.

In August 2007, officials began development of the Army Family Covenant and the Soldier Family Action Plan. They called for improvements in postcombat support to Soldiers and families to mitigate accumulated effects of conflict and assess and develop mitigation strategies for PTSD and Traumatic Brain Injury in the Army, and ensure sufficient mental health care is available for our Soldiers, Soldiers at Fort Drum, N.Y., took the lead, raised their own funds and began high adventure training in September 2007.

civilians and families.

"I was riding around in the snow up here thinking about giving the Soldiers activities they would enjoy," said Gene Spencer, former Adventure Training chief who retired and later became complex manager over Adventure Training, Outdoor Recreation and Autocraft.

"High adventure recreation is the key to attracting interest," concluded Potter. "But the normal or routine activity offerings just won't do it because of what every Soldier experiences during a deployment. The biggest single challenge MWR will face after Soldiers return is offering activities that are attractive enough to keep them on base, or at least participating in MWR-sponsored programs.'

In September 2008, the Army held three pilots that combined high adventure activities with Battle-mind training, the culmination of all these efforts. WAQ will be centrally funded through the Family and Morale, Welfare and Recreation Command, with oversight from the Installation Management

The Army plans to cycle nearly 80,000 Soldiers through WAQ during the next year at a cost of just under $7 million.

Less running can mean more Soldier fitness

CAPT. VANCIL MCNULTY

U.S. Army Center for Health Promotion and Preventive Medicine

Everyone may have different motivations to exercise. If you are a Soldier, your exercise motivation may be to pass a physical training (PT) test or because your mission requires it

One of the pitfalls of preparing Soldiers to meet the physical rigors of completing the mission may be overtraining, also known as overuse. Overtraining occurs when the amount of exercise is out of balance with recovery or rest.

When imbalance happens, it can predispose a Soldier to injury. Hence, a leader's sincere desire to show that his or her unit exceeds the standards may be one of the reasons we have an epidemic of injuries today.

The Joint Services Physical Training Injury Prevention Work Group thoroughly reviewed proven injury-prevention strategies in the military. The work group found that too much running was the primary contributor to overuse, and that those who are at the greatest risk of injury are those who are least fit

A large amount of both military and civilian research shows that running volume (amount of running) significantly increases the risk of lower-extremity injuries (injuries to the legs). During initial military training, about 25 percent of men and about 50 percent of women incur one or more PT-related injuries.

About 80 percent of these injuries are in the lower extremities and are of the overuse type — a condition brought about by excessive running relative to the fitness level of the individual.

The work group found ample evidence that running mileage was an injury risk factor. An obvious intervention (change) is to reduce the amount of running performed by military members. In fact, this intervention has been proven to reduce injuries without affecting physical performance.

Marine recruits in a 12-week boot camp had a 54 percent reduction in stress fractures of the legs with essentially no change in aerobic fitness when they reduced their running mileage 40 percent (from 55 miles down to 33 miles).

A group of Soldiers in Basic Combat Training (BCT) who ran 56 miles was compared to BCT Soldiers who ran 130 miles in 12 weeks. The Soldiers who ran fewer miles during 12 weeks of BCT training not only decreased their injuries by 24 percent, but scored just as high on the two-mile run part of the Army Physical Fitness Test.

It is important to note that the group that ran less miles increased its marching mileage (117 miles versus 68 miles for the group that ran the higher mileage).

Increased marching is probably more realistic a scenario in wartime.

Another study compared male Navy recruits assigned to basic training divisions that ran either 12 to 18 miles or 26 to 44 miles. The lower-mileage division had lower injury rates, with 1.5-mile run time improvements that were the same as the higher-mileage divisions. In other words, a reduction of 20 miles of running during this Navy recruit training reduced injuries by 20 percent without negatively affecting physical fitness.

There are thresholds of running above which injuries increase dramatically without any significant gains in fitness. Running frequency of five times a week versus three times a week for 30 minutes increases the injury incidence (percent of subjects injured) by 225 percent without significantly improving fitness level. Running durations of 45 minutes versus 30 minutes, three times a week, increases the injury incidence by 125 percent without any significant change in fitness.

The bottom line: If Army leaders are serious about taking care of Soldiers and reducing PT-related profiles, there is plenty of hard evidence that proves less is more.

Hintz also suggested residents view the new AHFH Web site for housing updates — www.armyhawaiifamilyhousing.com.

Business Operation Division Marketing Representative Ruben Moreno, Family and Morale, Welfare and Recreation (FMWR), encouraged community members to attend the FMWR expoat the Aliamanu Military Reservation Physical Fitness Center, Feb. 4, 3–6 p.m., for information regarding numerous programs and events FMWR offers, as well as a chance to win tickets to the upcoming Pro Bowl.

In addition, he said, Richardson Pool is being fitted with a new slide, which is projected to be operational by Feb. 1.

A new bus service downtown was also announced to provide family members at Schofield Barracks and Fort Shafter a free ride to explore Waikiki's nightlife every other Friday. The next service is Jan. 30. To reserve a spot, call 655-9971 or 438-1985.

With the rise in popularity of social networking systems, FMWR is now on Facebook, and Facebook users are encouraged to remain informed about upcoming events and offers by becoming "friends" with FMWR.

"We are always looking for ways to keep connected with Soldiers and family members," said Moreno. "Social networking sites are very popular with our younger members."

As the meeting entered the question-andanswer portion, housing remained a top concern for residents. Many members residing in the Santa Fe community expressed concern over dim lighting, speeding cars and dumpsters recently placed in their area. Subject matter experts listened to concerns, took notes and stated possible resolutions.

Col. Matthew Margotta, commander, USAG-Hawaii, said the garrison is currently in the third year of a 10-year plan to upgrade housing, which equates to 23 percent of families living in "good" quarters.

"We are working on it," said Margotta. "It is not going to happen overnight, but we are well aware of the issues."

The meeting adjourned and community members sought out subject matter experts for one-on-one advice

Miller echoed Wilson's sentiments.

"Martin Luther King has always been a very inspiring person for me," said Miller, an information systems analyst and company equal opportunity representative, 396th Signal Company, 30th Signal Battalion.

Miller read the Presidential Proclamation formally designating Jan. 19 as the Dr. Martin Luther King Jr. federal holiday.

"(King) inspires me to be a better person, to be a better leader, and to show by example that we should basically treat each other well and be good to each other," he said.

Of course, that was one of King's foremost legacies — the legacy of peace and love.

It was precisely this legacy that the event's keynote speaker addressed and challenged those in attendance to consider.

"Who are you?" asked Chaplain (Maj.) Victor Richardson, 1101st Garrison Support Unit. For Richardson, examining this question was an endeavor that King forced all Americans to consider.

"(King) asked a nation to think about who we were as a people. And if our lives were books and the books were written, how would the book read?" Richardson asked. "Outside of America, if they knew what we were doing inside and we could write a book about it, what would it say about us as a nation, and do you want it to say that, or do you want it changed?"

According to Richardson, Martin Luther King Jr. asked Americans to simply live up to their creed. His message was about unity and the hope that people would not only respect each other, but love each other and hold each other in the highest regard.

"We are a nation of our diversity, and we are a nation of people searching for things that connect us to each other. We are a nation in search of one word — love," said Richardson. "No matter who you are, no matter what rank, no matter what culture, you are in search of love, and Dr. Martin Luther King Jr. asked, 'Why don't we just love each other and let all the other stuff go?"

been one of shortcuts or settling for less."

America is a country of doers and risk-takers. It is an immigrant country where each generation worked hard to provide for the next, he said. Americans today must continue this journey, he added. It is time for hard decisions and a time of change.

The commander in chief also addressed changes in security.

"We reject as false the choice between our safety and our ideals," he said. "Our founding fathers — faced with perils that we can scarcely imagine — drafted a charter to assure the rule of law and the rights of man, a charter expanded by the blood of generations. Those ideals still light the world, and we will not give them up for expedience's sake."

The president reached out to the nations of the world in his speech. He told them that America "is a friend of each nation, and every man, woman and child who seeks a future of peace and dignity, and that we are ready to lead once more."

He promised a "prudent use" of military power and a greater role for the American example.

"Our security emanates from the justness of our cause, the force of our example, the tempering qualities of humility and restraint," he said.

The use of these principles will allow

America to develop greater understanding of other nations and greater cooperation against common threats from them. Obama said Americans will not apologize for their way of life, nor waver in its defense. In the United States, all languages are spoken, all religions are practiced, and all good people are welcomed.

As Americans look to the future, they also should remember to honor the Americans serving overseas and recall those who have sacrificed in the past.

"We honor them not only because they are guardians of our liberty, but because they embody the spirit of service; a willingness to find meaning in something greater than themselves," Obama said.

In addition, the garrison has a working development with Actus Lend Lease Corporation (Actus) for a possible photovoltaic farm on land purchased by Army Hawaii Family Housing (AHFH) in December 2008. The land was originally designated as a golf course to replace the Kalakaua Golf Course, which became the Kalakaua community.

Housing upgrades

Housing was a hot topic in 2008. Many community members questioned USAG-HI and AHFH on the changes taking place in military communities.

"We focused on establishing a positive, cooperative relationship with our partner Actus while ensuring that our families are provided the finest quality homes and residential communities," said Margotta, adding that Actus will build homes, as well as communities, including community centers, play areas and parks.

"Every member of Army Hawaii Family Housing and the garrison leadership fully understands that not all families in Hawaii are afforded the opportunity to live in 'quality' on-post quarters," said Margotta. "Many are old, small, lack amenities and are not commensurate with what they deserve."

The Army also recognized this issue, so in 2005, the Army and USAG-HI entered into a 50-year agreement with Actus to build 5,388 new homes, renovate 2,506 old and historic homes, and manage the Army's housing property.

"As you can imagine, this will not be accomplished overnight," said Margotta.

The 10-year, $2.3 billion development plan is the largest privatization project in the Department of Defense.

"When completed, we will be able to provide approximately 70 percent of our Army families in Hawaii high quality on-post housing," added Margotta.

However, due to rising construction, labor and fuel costs, as well as market rate adjustments, the 10-year plan may have to be extended to 13 years.

"This may have to be implemented in order to ensure that we do not reduce the overall number of new homes, sacrifice their quality or reduce the great additional community amenities," Margotta stated.

To put the plan in perspective, prior to privatization, from 1997 to 2005, the Army built only 516 new homes in Hawaii, the first in many years. In the three short years since 2005, Actus built more than 1,600 new homes across USAG-HI installations, with approximately 30 new homes coming on-line each month, and nine additional communities currently in development.

Additionally, AHFH has added three new community centers, a pool and numerous playgrounds and walking paths within the community.

Beautification efforts

Gate beautification, sign painting, restriping parking and traffic lanes, along with numerous building renovations, including the Fort Shafter vehicle registration office and the outdoor recreation center, kept installations looking sharp. Constant repair and beautification of the land continues into the new year.

According to Margotta, in 2008 the community spoke and the command listened. Through town hall meetings, public forums and numerous media outlets, including the Hawaii Army Weekly and garrison and directorate newsletters, the garrison strove to enhance communication between the command and the community.

"The garrison is in the customer service business," said Margotta. "We are no different than Chili's, Wal-Mart or any other business. Unless we listen to our customers and give them what they want, we are failing.

"We take this to heart and try our very best to provide the community with the finest services and support that our resources allow," continued Margotta. "We are looking forward to 2009 as we roll out several new mechanisms for the community to provide us feedback.

"With these, we hope it will provide us the means to receive better, more useful feedback and suggestions from our community members, allowing us to enhance the quality of life provided to our deserving Soldiers and their families."

Different Strokes

Military ohana develops talent at the Arts & Crafts Center

Story and Photos by MOLLY HAYDEN Staff Writer

SCHOFIELD BARRACKS — With the stroke of a paintbrush, many projects come to life. Whether painting a room, creating a piece of art, or touching up furniture, painting adds a creative, personal touch, turning the blandest of projects into a work of art.

Artists have practiced painting for hundreds of years. Through various painting courses at the Arts & Crafts Center here, members of the military ohana are unleashing their own artistic talents and finding a medium that best suites their tastes.

Art instructor Nikki Mizak stood behind family member Erin Rakes as she carefully dipped her paintbrush in oil paint, Tuesday, during the Adult Oil Painting class. On the table, four wine bottles and two wine glasses stood perfectly still, as if posing for the new artist.

A blank canvas leaned slightly on the tabletop easel. Rakes then placed the paint-brush on her canvas and ran the paint across in one brisk stroke. Mizak offered advice and explained techniques.

"The still life helps new artists explore the contrast of light and reflection and create depth within their artwork," said Mizak. "It's a lot better than painting from a photograph where your subject is flat, especially for a beginner."

The oil class is one of three painting classes offered at the center for adult family members to pursue artistic endeavors. The center also offers acrylic and watercolor painting classes.

Students at each class learn an array of painting techniques, color theory and art history. The different classes allow family members to explore various mediums and create works of art.

Thursday night, family members gathered for the acrylic painting class. Each picked a subject and began to draw it out on canvas. Family member Heather Brock painted a Family member Heather Brock painted a landscape from a recent trip to California. A brightly colored hot air balloon filled the left side of the canvas.

"I think having access to these kinds of tools is great," said Brock. "You can experiment and explore and find out what you are good at.

"You also get professional instruction and all the resources needed to create art without a whole lot of financial investment," Brock continued.

Art instructor Nikki Mizak paints alongside her students, offering advice and helpful hints on techniques during the adult oil painting class at the Schofield Barracks Arts & Crafts Center.

Mizak suggested experimenting with various mediums at the Arts & Crafts Center before investing in paints, since paint preference varies from person to person.

Mizak said oil paints are the most forgiving and offer depth within a painting, but take days to dry. Oils also produce softer textures and are more brilliant in color. Acrylic paints dry fast and produce sharper edges, but tend to be a bit flat. With watercolors, artists have only one chance to create a piece of work, but the medium carries a very specific look, according to Mizak.

For more information on adult art classes at the Schofield Barracks Arts & Crafts Center, call 655-4202.

"Some people believe they have no artistic talent," said Mizak. "This gives family members a chance to try their hand at art and unleash the talent within them."

Mizak explained the intention of each painting project is to encourage participants to explore new subjects and techniques and to challenge them in a new way. She added, artwork is considered priceless thoughts of a painter.

"Each painting is unique and illustrates the artist's perception of life," said Mizak.

"After a few lessons, each student is amazed at what they can do."

Oil paints, along with acrylic and watercolor, offer family members an array of media to quell their thirst for art. Numerous painting classes abound for every member of the military ohana at the Schofield Arts & Crafts Center.

'Shafterbots' take first place in robotics competition

COL. WAYNE SHANKS U.S. Army-Pacific Public Affairs

HONOLULU - Shafter Elementary's robotics team, the "Shafterbots," won the first place award for the best innovative solution at this year's Hawaii State FIRST LEGO League (FLL) Championship Tournament, Sunday.

The Project Innovative Solution award recognized the team that developed the most thought-provoking and innovative resolution to this year's competition theme "Climate Connections."

2009 was Shafter Elementary's first year of offering students the opportunity to participate in a robotics program, as well as in the FLL competition.

"Through the many challenges the students faced with the different aspects of the competition, they have proven that hard work and perseverance make a successful team," said Sheri Fujii, team coach and Shafter Elementary's technology co-

The Climate Connections theme required 9- to 14-year-old students to reclimate-related issues. The teams' research and solutions were then presented to a panel of judges.

Teams also constructed and programmed a robot to accomplish simulated missions associated with Climate Connections. The competition's missions included burying carbon dioxide, constructing and testing levees, raising flood barriers, elevating a house, delivering an ice buoy and studying wildlife.

Shafter Elementary's Scott Greene (center), 11, and Kyle Bender (right), 10, make adjustments to their robot as a judge rates their search and present their own solutions to performance during Hawaii's FIRST LEGO League Championship Tournament, Sunday, at the Neal S. Blaisdell Arena in Honolulu.

The Shafterbots chose to prepare a duce oxygen and absorb carbon dioxide, dioxide is making our atmosphere thickproject exploring the effect of greenhouse gases on the bleaching of coral reefs. The team came up with an innovative solution after studying the link between rising levels of carbon dioxide with warming ocean temperatures.

Kyle Bender, 11, presented "Phytoplanktonanator 3000," which proposes in an effort to decrease water temperatures and save coral reefs.

The team's research led it to several conclusions.

"I have noticed that the climate has changed because of four main causes: the greenhouse effect, human activity, factories and carbon dioxide," said Scott er, so when the sun's rays come in our atmosphere, they get trapped inside causing our earth to heat up.'

Team members Ann Ragasa, 10, and Brianna Trotter, 11, explained how coral bleaching is caused by increased water temperatures.

"I learned that the coral at the Great to clone phytoplankton, plants that pro- Greene, 11. "All the pollution and carbon Barrier Reef will most likely be dead in suffer heat stress, eventually making them bleached and (then they) die," said

Deana Canfield, 12, and Jessica Harper, 9, noted that increasing phytoplankton in the oceans could eat excess carbon dioxide, but may cause an additional problem.

"Phytoplankton grows very quickly, only living for a day or so, but when it dies and is eaten, it also changes into carbon dioxide," Harper explained. "But there is a solution. If the phytoplankton is in the deep water, the carbon dioxide can't return to the atmosphere, helping our sea surface temperature.'

Finally, Bender explained the robotic solution to decreasing the amount of carbon dioxide in the ocean.

"In the ocean, after the phytoplankton eats up all the carbon dioxide, a robot will be sent to collect it," Bender said. "Once it's collected, the robot will take it to the deep parts of the ocean to bury it, so that the carbon will not re-enter the atmosphere."

Shafter Elementary was one of 48 finalist teams from elementary and middle schools across the state that demonstrated their creativity and skills at the Hawaii FLL State Championship Tournament, held at the Neal S. Blaisdell Arena in Honolulu.

Shafter Elementary also entered two teams in the Junior FLL exposition (ages 6-9), where students displayed works they created based on the FLL
