types of vehicle searches, and practiced them. I think that this is one of those skills Marines should know.”

The practical application also covered how to safely and properly subdue a person. The Marines practiced handcuffing each other at various stages of force escalation. The instructors from the PMO acted out the example and then supervised as the Marines went through the drills.

“According to base order, SAF needs to have a certain number of Marines trained to assist PMO should an emergency arise,” said Howard Shappee, training specialist with PMO. “What they are ready to do is to increase manpower and protect our security assets. In the past SAF has been activated during hurricanes. They stayed behind on base with our MP’s and assisted with security and recovery efforts.”

During destructive weather events in the past years SAF has been an integral part of the destructive weather team. When the rest of the base evacuates, SAF and the destructive weather team stay behind to begin recovery efforts as soon as the storm passes. SAF also protects the security assets on base in the event that a section of the perimeter fence falls down.

“This kind of training really encompasses to me what it means to be a Marine,” said Lance Cpl. Terry Haynes, a communications strategist. “Marines train how we fight and having this extra bit of knowledge to keep everyone safe is worth it.”

The SAF Marines trained to assist our PMO Marines and civilian personnel who work tirelessly to provide security to our Marines, Sailors, civilians and their families. During emergencies and recovery efforts SAF is ready to add strength to PMO, speed recovery efforts and exemplify the phrase, Semper Fidelis, always faithful.
