‘Realm of the Possible’ Revealed by Multi-Mission Unmanned Surface Vehicle

By JOHN JOYCE, NSWC Dahlgren Division Corporate Communications

An unmanned surface vehicle suddenly appeared on the Potomac River Test Range and, much like the ospreys that inhabit the area, it was on a mission to traverse the river – autonomously.

Nearby, an osprey watched the unusual sight from its nest as an array of autonomous guns and missile systems were lined up on a pier.

Distinguished visitors gathered on that pier to see the sight – a demonstration of Textron Systems’ Common Unmanned Surface Vehicle (CUSV). They listened intently as Navy and corporate leaders discussed their collaboration to weaponize a CUSV capable of multiple missions.

“The reason we collaborate is because we as a nation find ourselves in a situation where we can no longer take time to deliver capability to our warfighters,” John Fiore, Naval Surface Warfare Center Dahlgren Division (NSWCDD) technical director, told government, defense contractors and military personnel at the March 28 event. “We as a warfare center and you as industry are tasked to make sure our Sailors and Marines can deploy, execute their mission, and come home safely to their families and loved ones.”

NSWCDD engineers explained how the weapon technologies they developed will be evaluated for integration with Textron Systems’ CUSV to create a new modular autonomous weapon system to impact the Fleet’s maritime operations. There is currently no program or acquisition in place to implement these efforts, as they are in the early development stages without funding or planning to implement into the Fleet.

“Our first project is what we are calling a Surface and Expeditionary Warfare Mission Module which will consist of our engagement technology paired with our Battle Management System (BMS) controlling a Longbow Hellfire Missile,” said Chris Nerney, NSWCDD technical program manager for Unmanned Systems. “The idea is a mission package that could slide into the CUSV modular mission bay and provide a direct and indirect fire capability.”

Indian Head Environmental Department Brings Earth Day Education and Fun to CDC

German cosmonaut Sigmund Jähn once said, “Only when I saw the Earth from space, in all its ineffable beauty and fragility, did I realize that humankind’s most urgent task is to cherish and preserve it for future generations.” Sentiments like that are what drive the annual observance of Earth Day. On Naval Support Facility (NSF) Indian Head, the base Environmental Department took the mission of environmental protection and respect to the future generations of the community on April 23 with an ecological extravaganza at the Child Development Center (CDC).

Tara Meadows, natural resources specialist at NSF Indian Head, shared her thoughts on introducing environmental awareness to those little ones, stating that “It’s never too early to start reinforcing the idea of being a good steward of our planet, its resources and the other creatures we share it with.”

The environmental team created activities to help young people understand recycling and how storm-water runoff impacts local waterways, along with introducing the youngsters to some of the local flora and fauna with taxidermy and live animal displays.

“With these young ages in mind, we tried to make recycling more of an interactive game for them so they have fun, while the goal is setting up what would become a daily life habit. Hopefully, this will make it second nature for them to consider whether something could be re-used instead of throwing it away in a landfill,” Meadows said.

Marines (and Civilians) Storm NSF Indian Head to Scour Shoreline for Trash

By BARBARA WAGNER

Chemical Biological Incident Response Force (CBIRF) Marines and Sailors stormed the beach at Naval Support Facility (NSF) Indian Head on April 12 and left no man — or litter — behind. The Marines were there to participate in their annual beach clean-up ahead of other Earth Day events planned for NSF Indian Head and NSF Dahlgren. April is recognized nationally as Earth Month with April 22 set aside as the official Earth Day. This year, a record number of CBIRF personnel turned out to do their part to ensure the beachfront and waterline at the base were free of litter.

In total, 86 Marines showed up for the event and swarmed the shoreline below the Mix House and made short work of the litter clean-up in the mile of shoreline that they lay claim to for the day.

Two days later, 11 civilians from several NSF Indian Head-based commands turned out at Dashiell Marina to continue the mission of beach beautification; Mother Nature ensured that the weather both days was spectacular, albeit a bit windy. The wind, however, did not deter either group for tackling the trash that littered the beach.

Hospital Corpsman Julissa Langston were part of the contingent from the Naval Branch Health Clinic who turned out to assist in the clean-up. Both agreed the volunteer hours are wonderful and that the environment is a good cause for their Saturday morning.

"I hate litter, I can't stand it," Langston said. "The weather was nice, and if it's for the environment, I was definitely in to help."

Between the two groups, 97 large bags of litter and debris were removed from the shoreline along with six tires and William Fabey, the NSF Indian Head Stormwater Program Manager, estimated the effort removed roughly 560 pounds of trash.

Despite a large number of participants this year, the total amount of trash collected from the shorelines was a bit lower than previous years, due in part to the massive Nor'easter that ripped through the Lower Potomac River region causing a tidal blowout in early March. Fabey reckons that a goodly amount of debris that would typically have been found along the shores of NSF Indian Head was swept out to the Chesapeake Bay and possibly further into the Atlantic Ocean helped along by the heavy winds.

close to the animals to see them and hear the sounds of some of the local species.

"These types of activities foster connectedness to the natural world that will help shape the children's opinions on environmental citizenship," Meadows explained.

The environmental team had a number of activities for the children including a tree planting, mock recycling bins for the children to learn to sort, a stormwater board to demonstrate water runoff, different Earth Day-themed arts and crafts, as well as an opportunity to play in the dirt a bit and plant flowers.

"Small actions by many hands can have large results in terms of positive impacts on the environment," Meadows concluded.

It is through events like this, the annual beach clean-ups that occur on both sides of the Potomac River and other events made through the Naval Support Activity South Potomac environmental teams that — in cooperation with local efforts — continue to make an impact on the health of local rivers, creeks and lands.

capability with a gunfire demonstration later this year, followed by a live missile shoot in 2019.

"We are creating a modular surface and expeditionary warfare payload with a gun and a missile weapon system to be evaluated for integration onto the common unmanned surface vehicle," said Kevin Green, NSWCDD technical lead for Ship-to-Shore Precision Engagement Integration and Prototype. "This payload could enable warfighters to counter fast attack craft and fast inshore attack craft and it could provide ship-to-shore fire support for expeditionary and special operations forces. It also gives us a baseline development effort to operate and perform further research and development."

Meanwhile, Nerney, Green and their Textron Systems collaborators are envisioning how new payloads in the CUSV mission bay could benefit warfighters in various missions from maritime interdiction and special operations to surface warfare encounters that include engaging fast attack craft and fast inshore attack craft as well as other threats.

"We're demonstrating the realm of the possible, proof of concept, and leveraging a Textron developmental craft and proven weapon systems with the Hellfire, BMS, and other capabilities," said Wayne Prender, Textron Systems vice president of Control & Surface Systems. "Now, we're bringing those technologies together and implementing them in an autonomous way that's unique and new."

For surface and expeditionary warfare missions, warfighters could use a modular, plug and play unit designed to fit the CUSV mission bay. This mission module includes sensors for targeting, a weapon station with a gun, and a launcher system for missiles. It could provide capabilities to enable a myriad of missions outlined in the Unmanned Surface Vehicle Master Plan.

NSWCDD engineers are creating the payload in response to guidance outlined in the Navy's recent USV Strategic Roadmap and the Marine Corps Operating Concept. Moreover, they determined that weaponizing a USV with both direct and indirect fire capability could expand the USV mission portfolio to include surface warfare, maritime security, and maritime interdiction operations in addition to special operations forces and expeditionary forces support.

"We are developing automated weapon systems that provide tactically effective automation of the entire kill chain, and we're doing so

NSASP Purpled Up For Month of the Military Child

By BARBARA WAGNER
South Potomac Pilot

Military children are being honored all month long during national Month of the Military Child, when participants “Purple Up” to acknowledge the service and sacrifice of these special members of our military families as they support their military parent or guardian. At Naval Support Activity South Potomac, these pint-sized members of our military family have been fêted on at both Naval Support Facility (NSF) Dahlgren and NSF Indian Head. At the latter, the children were enriched through a Science, Technology, Engineering, Arts and Math (STEAM)-based carnival at NSF Indian Head and at the former, they were nourished with a special purple pancake supper.

The weather could not have been more beautiful with blue skies and warm temperatures April 14 as staff of the NSF Indian Head Morale, Welfare and Recreation (MWR) joined forces with the Chemical Biological Incident Response Force (CBIRF) to show appreciation and entertain youngsters from the installation with a STEAM carnival featuring loads of events for the children to enjoy.

The CBIRF personnel demonstrated their skills with their robot called the Remote Ordnance Neutralization System, whose job it is to survey and identify unknown or suspicious devices; on this special day, however, the robots were a part of the entertainment for the children as the Marines demonstrated their remote driving skills and led the robotic members of their team through obstacles with stair-climbing, navigational finesse.

MWR Staff had displays for the artistically-minded with portable sand art creations, sensational slime-making, a mind-boggling computer-based banana bongo sound-system along with an athletically-challenging obstacle relay course, balloon sculptures and random silliness from the Cole Brothers Circus of the Stars clowning duo of Blondie and Bunky; a massive interactive Lego display and challenges from the Play Well organization rounded out the activities along with a scrumptious lunch of DIY subs with all the fixings to tempt tiny appetites.

The events of the day kicked off with a welcome from Sarah Hagensick, the facilities Youth Activities Coordinator, and the reading of a proclamation by NSASP Commanding Officer Capt. Michael O'Leary dedicating the month to the military children.

Following the proclamation, O'Leary introduced NSF Indian Head Military Youth of the Year -Detron Dancy. Dancy is a longtime participant at the Youth Activity Center (YAC) aboard Indian Head and has also been a student counselor at the facility.

On the other side of the Potomac River at NSF Dahlgren, the youngest members of the military and their families were treated to breakfast for dinner April 18 courtesy of the Dahlgren YAC at the Gray's Landing on the Potomac Restaurant. Staff at the facility went all out to show their “purple” support with a meal including lovely lavender pancakes – in honor of purpling up, naturally – fresh scrambled eggs, bacon, sausage, hash browns and yummy fresh fruit.

Takeema Bowens, Dahlgren's youth activity director welcomed the gathering of families and Rachel Archulet, Dahlgren's two-time winner of Youth of the Year spoke about her life as a military child and her time at the YAC and the impact it has made on her life.

“Being a military child means many things including sacrifice and I thank our military children here, who understand that the month from frequent relocations to long months spent missing their deployed parent,” said Archulet. “We are here to celebrate them for everything they've done to support their parents as they are protecting our country.”

Archulet introduced Ayla and Sarah Zook, daughters of Capt. David Zook, AEGIS Training and Readiness Center commanding officer, who took a few moments to express what being a military child has meant to them.

“My dad has been in the Navy for 22 years,” Ayla shared. “Ten years ago he was stationed in Canada where I was born. Many military kids are born overseas so we get to explore different cultures foods and experiences.”

Devin Wise, the Dahlgren Military Youth of the Year, was unable to attend the event due to a previously scheduled family commitment.

As O'Leary read the official proclamation – roughly a three foot tall document – he declared that it was necessary to have such a large decree because military children were such a big deal aboard NSASP.

O'Leary praised the strength of military children and noted that they too make sacrifices in service to the nation. “We recognize our military children for their continued sacrifice; of having to grow up with one or the other of their parents constantly being away normally performing high risk duties.

“The resilience and maturity demonstrated by the average military child far exceeds the same characteristics of their average peer group from the rest of the United States,” he continued. “They are also the reason for their service member parent to push through the hard times, to fight to ensure their continued freedom and to never give up in order to come home. There is nothing better for a service member than getting to hug your children upon returning home after many months away. For me, personally, they are why I fight and sacrifice. They make my service to the country worth the effort.”

Following the presentation, the children spent time playing board games and enjoying some much deserved family time while the parents enjoyed a dish-free dinner and fresh coffee.

NSF Dahlgren Hosts Inaugural Sprint Marathon

By BARBARA WAGNER

Taking advantage of a rare gorgeous sunny backdrop this past Saturday, Naval Support Facility (NSF) Dahlgren held its inaugural Spring Sprint Triathlon. While NSF Indian Head has done a number of sprint triathlons before, Dahlgren MWR staff had never attempted to put one together prior to this year.

“We’ve always done one up at Indian Head,” Naval Support Activity South Potomac Executive Officer Cmdr. Robert Lusk explained. “There’s a real solid following of triathlons and triathletes here, so Jim Feldman, Marissa Fabey and I put our heads together to see what we could do. The MWR staff put a lot into this event.”

A sprint triathlon requires more logistic support than a traditional 5k. Support from the Naval District Washington Fire and Emergency Services Dahlgren Company as well as the base police force along with the Aquatics Center was needed to ensure a safe and enjoyable event for all.

The event drew 28 participants of all ages and skill sets from around the region.

“We also had support from more than 45 volunteers,” Rachel Katzman, NSF Dahlgren Fitness Center director said, “some of whom were friends or family of racers, as well as base police and fire/EMS staff present.”

The volunteers assisted on the course with safety and directing runners as well as cheering them on as they pushed towards the finish line.

One of the aspects that made this a “sprint” triathlon was the shorter swim. A traditional triathlon features a little more than 750 meters in open water but the Dahlgren Sprint participants were only required to complete 300 yards at the pool.

“We had at least eight participants — including some bucket list folks — who said this is my chance to do this because of that controlled environment,” Lusk said.

“I like to think the shorter swim was an attraction for people who are less experienced to try something new,” Katzman said. “Fitness is so multi-dimensional, but people tend to get stuck doing what they know and nothing more — it’s not just running or just lifting weights or just swimming — and I think that events like this are a great way to explore what your body is capable of and expand your range of activities.”

The fastest racer completed the course in just over an hour with the last one coming in at just under two and a half hours.

“The important thing for this race was for participants to be able to compete at their level,” Katzman said. “Some were competitive athletes who were using this event to kick off their triathlon season and some were doing a race like this for the first time. My goal for this event was to have a good mix of participation and not to scare anyone off with threats of pulling people off the course if they took too long.”

“Overall it was an outstanding event and a great job by everyone from South Potomac,” Lusk concluded.

with minimal dependence on what is usually an unreliable datalink," said Green. "Our experience integrating unmanned systems has taught us that the weapon systems must be just as automated as the platforms themselves in order to reduce the number of operators and operate reliably beyond line of sight."

Specifically, Sailors and Marines could be able to use the Battle Management System to fire missiles and precision-guided munitions from the CUSV. They would use the autonomous system for detection, tracking, and direct fire engagement.

"If the decision was made to outfit the CUSV with a variety of payloads, it could be deployed from nearly any large ship and could be deployed in significant numbers from a U.S. Navy ship or a Joint High-Speed Vessel type platform to perform a variety of roles," said Nerney. "We are focused on the Mine Countermeasures Unmanned Surface Vehicle today because it's the Navy's only program of record unmanned surface vehicle platform. It's also our concept of modular plug and play weapon systems integrated onto a USV that can be scaled up or down as appropriate. If the Navy or Marine Corps decides to build big unmanned surface vehicles, we could scale the guns and missiles up. If the decision is to go with swarms of small USVs, then we could scale the system down accordingly."

Between now and the live fire test, NSWCDD and Textron Systems will work together to rapidly develop and integrate as proofs of concept a variety of surface and expeditionary warfare payloads for the CUSV to include operations with unmanned air and subsurface vehicles.

"Our partnerships with industry allow us to move fast," said Fiore. "If you're the one that's going to be giving this capability to warfighters, I want you to be effective in doing that. That's what motivates us and that's why we collaborate. That's why it's so important for us to have you here today with your equipment and have you partnering with us."

The Navy's collaboration with Textron Systems began in 2011 when the developmental Common Unmanned Surface Vehicle was developed and used in a variety of Navy demonstrations.

In December 2017, the company signed a cooperative research and development agreement (CRADA) with NSWCDD. The agreement covers the integration of missile, designator, and remote weapon station payloads to Textron Systems' developmental CUSV with its 3,500-pound payload capacity on the deck and a payload bay measuring 20.5 x 6.5 feet.

The company previously contracted with the Navy to develop the new Unmanned Influence Sweep System (UISS) – minesweeping units towed by the CUSV – which will perform a mine countermeasure mission in support of a littoral combat ship.

"Building on the UISS program as the foundation, we signed the Cooperative Research and Development Agreement with Dahlgren," said Prender. "We began to prototype surface warfare packages and other payloads that will strengthen the flexibility and potential capability of our platform and continue to inform the Navy and Marine Corps and overall surface community what the realm of the possible can be as they begin to expand the use of unmanned systems – in this case, unmanned surface vehicles."

The CRADA points out that NSWCDD will develop a government-owned open architecture weapon control system to include both hardware and software. Implementations of this design will enable rapid development to support and control a variety of precision-guided weapons. This open architecture concept will allow vendors to provide munitions and subsystems for future capabilities as long as the munitions and subsystems support the government-owned interfaces.

"We are only limited by our imaginations," said Nerney. "Other ideas in the works for mission packages include intelligence, surveillance and reconnaissance. We can develop mission packages to support the carrying and launching of UAV's – armed and unarmed. This will give us a hunter-killer over-the-horizon capability by pairing the armed common unmanned surface vehicle with an armed Firescout, laser weapon, or vessel-stopping equipment."

Devon Wise, Dahlgren 2018 Military Youth of the Year

By BARBARA WAGNER
South Potomac Pilot

King George High School Junior Devon Wise, son of Denise Wise, a Naval Surface Warfare Center Dahlgren Division employee, is Naval Support Facility (NSF) Dahlgren Boys and Girls Club of America 2018-2019 Military Youth of the Year.

Wise is a member of the National Junior Honor Society at his high school and is also enrolled in the Governor's School. In addition to participating in the local Parks and Recreations Basketball League program, Wise volunteers his time at the NSF Dahlgren Youth Activity Center (YAC).

"Devon gives back 1,000 percent to the program," Aylee Eller, child and youth program leader at the YAC said. "He is here whenever he can be and he loves helping. Overall, he an outstanding young man."

"I went to the youth center growing up and I enjoy spending time there," Wise said. "I enjoy spending time with the children."

Wise hopes to attend James Madison University and study engineering.

De'Tron Dancy, NSF Indian Head 2018 Military Youth of the Year

By BARBARA WAGNER
South Potomac Pilot

De'Tron Dancy is Naval Support Facility (NSF) Indian Head 2018 Military Youth of the Year and according to Sarah Hagensick, Child and Youth Programs (CYP) director, despite all of De'Tron's dynamic characteristics and exciting accomplishments, he is only just beginning his journey as a young leader.

At Henry E. Lackey High School, De'Tron plays on the lacrosse and soccer team and is also a member of the wrestling team. In addition to excelling in sports, De'Tron is also a corporal in the Henry E. Lackey High School Air Force Junior ROTC.

Outside of his scholastic and athletic accomplishments, De'Tron volunteers within his church community and aboard NSF Indian Head. It was while he was working with the Youth Activity Center (YAC) with Hagensick that she was able to see his outstanding leadership qualities that culminated in his nomination and selection as the NSF Indian Head Youth of the Year.

"He showed us his leadership abilities, but he didn't even realize he had them," Hagensick shared. "It wasn't until he started to work with us through the summer program, that everyone saw that seed of leadership in him. By the end of the summer, I said, 'De'Tron, you doubt your ability; you are such a leader, you guide and lead on a regular basis because that's what you do and you don't even realize that you're even doing it.' He began to see that and began to step out and take risks, trying different sports, doing different activities and putting himself out there and all of the sudden this amazing person has just blossomed and it's been that progression in him that has just exploded."

The Youth of the Year application has been a defining process for Dancy. He credits his leadership at the Indian Head YAC with helping him.

"My parents, Ms. Sarah, the Youth Center," Dancy said. "They have helped me identify those skills. You have to dig deep. You have to find where your grind is at and you have to find who you are. You have to put the work in. After all of this, I see in myself as a confident leader who is willing to take risks to reach my full potential."

De'Tron Dancy is the oldest of five boys to Chief Intelligence Specialist Danny Dancy and his wife Shayla Dancy.

De'Tron hopes to attend the University of Maryland, majoring in Engineering after he graduates from High School.

The Youth of the Year program, sponsored by the Boys and Girls Club of America, is in its 71st year. The program honors the nation's most awe-inspiring young people on their path to successful futures and encourages all kids to lead, succeed and inspire.

Motorcycle Awareness Event Drives Home Safety Issues

By BARBARA WAGNER
South Potomac Pilot

Motorcycle enthusiasts from Naval Support Facility (NSF) Dahlgren gathered April 19 at the base theater for an annual training event that featured a discussion on Virginia law, training from Virginia State Trooper Officer Joel Cleary, a refresher on Naval Support Activity South Potomac guidance for riders who wish to ride their bikes on base and a question and answer period. While training is held annually, this year seemed particularly vital for the team of dedicated riders who coordinate the event each year.

“In the month of February, we lost six riders Navy and Marine Corps wide,” Chief Gunners Mate Adam Gleason shared. “These riders weren’t just [junior] enlisted, inexperienced riders — when you’re riding, it doesn’t discriminate and that’s one of things we want to bring home. When we’re out there having fun because we all like riding, we also need to be safe, so we can come back and do the mission.”

Gleason also thanked the other members of the team who coordinated the event including retired Navy and current Dahlgren civilian employee James Antone, Intelligence Specialist 1st Class Joshua Messier and Chief Culinary Specialist Jermaine Strand and Fire Controlman 1st Class Alden Gamat.

Following the training, a group of riders headed out for an 81-mile afternoon ride that culminated in delicious barbecue and comradery. If you are interested in learning more about base guidance for motorcycles, local riding clubs or anything else related to motorcycles, contact Gleason at adam.gleason1@navy.mil, James.antone@navy.mil or if you are an AEGIS Training and Readiness Center (ATRC) contact alden.gamat@navy.mil

Three Steps to Assess Your Savings this April During Financial Literacy Month

By DARLENE ADEROJU/MILITARYSAVES.ORG
Department of Defense's Financial Readiness Campaign

Financial Literacy Month is the perfect time to assess your finances and evaluate your level of savings preparedness. If you have an exceptional ability to manage debt, maintain an emergency savings fund and plan your finances, you're already a great saver. If you want to improve your savings habits, start by asking yourself these questions.

Do you have a financial plan that includes savings and debt management goals?

Savers with a plan are twice as likely to save successfully. You'll feel more motivated to save money if you have a plan in place. You can start your financial plan by creating a budget based on your monthly and expenses. It'll get much easier to save if you have a goal in mind to keep yourself motivated.

Reducing debt is just as important as saving, so you should include debt management in your financial plan. You can begin by paying off your high-interest rate debt first. The longer you wait to pay it down, the more money you'll end up spending. You can also focus on paying off smaller debts first. Sometimes, getting rid of smaller debts will give you the extra push to tackle your larger outstanding balances.

Do you have an emergency fund to cover at least $500 of unexpected expenses?

If you make saving for a rainy day one of your top priorities, you'll thank yourself later. When unexpected expenses occur, you'll be financially prepared to deal with them. One thing you can work toward with your emergency fund is saving enough money to last for three to six months if you were to lose your job. When you have that much cushion, you'll feel much more confident about your finances.

Do you save money automatically?

The easiest, most effective way to save is automatically. Set up direct deposit into your savings account, so a portion of your paycheck can go into savings each time to you get paid. You'll be surprised at how much money you can save when your contributions are consistent. This also helps to ensure that you don't give up. Putting money in your savings account might be easy now while you're excited to get started, but it might get a little hard later on. When your savings are automatic, you don't have to worry about losing your momentum.

You should also make your retirement savings automatic. If you've opted into the Blended Retirement System, don't forget this important step! Set up automatic contributions of at least 5 percent into your Thrift Savings Plan (TSP) to get the full match owed to you.
