A Sea Story from ABF1 Daniel Arbogast

Twelve people died when two Marine Corps CH-53E Sea Stallions from Kaneohe Bay crashed off the north coast of Hawaii in 2016. ABF1 Daniel Arbogast, Truman's air department V-4 division flight deck ALPO, was the last person to physically see the aircraft and crew.

Q: When was the incident?

Arbogast: I was an E5 and about 27, stationed in Kaneohe Bay, a Marine Corps base in Hawaii.

Q: What happened?

Arbogast: It was actually a normal Friday night. We ran all of our samples and were getting ready to shut down for the night. We got one last call for the night to fuel two 53s. We went out and topped off the two aircraft. I remember giving the fire bottle watch a high-five on his way back to the aircraft. It was my last fueling evolution of the day. I went back to the shop to close down for the day. About an hour later, I got a phone call that said I needed to start packaging up all of our QA logs. We just had two 53s go missing off the coast. I specifically remember the whole situation. I gave that guy a high five, took the receipts from him and carried on with my day like it was a normal day, and an hour later it wasn't.

Q: What was the outcome after that day?

Arbogast: Whenever there's an aircraft crash of any sort, the first thing they do is look into the fuels logs to find an explanation for the crash. Right after it happened I received a phone call saying to get my logs and make sure they're ready to go.

About two or three days later, I went up with my wife to the town where they were basing their search and rescue mission out of. We went to drop off water bottles and bagged lunches, because these guys were out there searching for just hours and hours without a break. I'll never forget seeing those families standing on the beach staring out at the ocean, just hoping that somebody would catch a glimpse of something just for the closure.

They found those two 53s at the bottom of the Pacific about three months later with all crew members still on board. Fortunately for me, it was non-fuel related, but say that to the 12 families who are filling a void.

Q: What did you learn from this experience?

Arbogast: One of the biggest things I learned from the situation is that all the little things that you don't take seriously, like doing your one-lines or using whiteout on logs, it's absolutely pertinent that you do it correctly. What seems mundane to you can easily take somebody's life. When something like that happens, you start wondering, "Did I do everything correctly? or, Did I gundeck? No, I didn't, but what did I do wrong?" Even though it ultimately didn't fall down on me, when you're the last person to deal with somebody, and then you have an investigative type situation that falls down on something you were directly involved in, you really worry if you did everything correctly.

Q: What message would you like to give to junior Sailors?

Arbogast: My message is don't gundeck. If you don't gundeck, you'll have nothing to worry about. You might take things as a mundane task, get complacent with it, and start to cut corners. That's all fine. Until it's not. You live with that memory. You have that for the rest of your life. Just do the right thing, so you don't have even the slightest possibility of thinking you might've killed somebody.

Marines hold a memorial service for the lives lost.

“...the vice president was wearing something that I personally made. It was an unexpected surprise.”

Two of Truman’s AIMD Sailors have been silently competing with the BMs and PRs in all things embroidery.

AIMD’s jet shop had a plotting machine that made stencils for jerseys, until the plotter broke. To replace the broken plotter, an embroidery machine was moved from the PR shop to a space in the jet shop. When it was in the PR space, it was used for jerseys, labeling seat covers and other projects.

Air framers AM3 Justin Hilt and AM3 Ian Van Matre have taken time away from their rate to learn and master the software and functions of the embroidery machine.

“Most of our training has been trial-and-error,” said Van Matre. “Even after a year of using this machine, I still find new things.”

The computer-based software allows the user to upload images to be sewn, or the user can input a series of shapes to create the desired image. At this point in their experience, Hilt and Van Matre can look at a patch and know what pattern creates the design with the confidence they have the skill to recreate it.

“I have sewn a lot; from the symbol of the band Godsmack to an autism awareness ribbon,” said Hilt. “We can make just about anything.”

Hilt was even able to sew a couple of embroidery pieces for Vice President Mike Pence during his visit to Truman this April.

“Although it was just a hat and nametag, I was excited,” said Hilt. “It wasn’t anything extravagant, but the vice president was wearing something that I personally made. It was an unexpected surprise. I’m proud that my work was decent enough for him to sport.”

While some of Hilt and Van Matre’s more creative work can be seen among the crew, the embroidery shop is purposed for case-by-case requests. # SAILOR, SAR SWIMMER, DECK MASTER

STORY BY MC1 D. KEITH SIMMONS

In comic book stores across America, a new game hit shelves that was unlike any other game before it, mixing magical beasts and legendary creatures from fiction books and other fantasy role playing games. The card game put children of all ages in command of diverse armies to do battle with one another, casting spells of blue, white, red, black or green with various effects to try to defeat their opponents.

The year was 1995, and a young man from Chanute, Kansas, was on a class trip to Chicago when he first saw other teenagers battling one another on the sidelines of the National High School Chess Championship.

"I had never seen people playing an interactive game with cards, besides something simple like Uno or a basic card game," said AWS1 Christopher Mefford, an HSC-11 rescue swimmer who has been in the Navy for over 18 years. "It was drastically different than anything that had come out at the time. There was nothing like that. We had never seen anything of that genre."

It wasn't long after that trip that Mefford said he and his friends would gather at a friend's house to open their packs of cards to see what they had collected and compare their most powerful warriors.

"We thought, 'Oh my God, this is the coolest card ever,'" said Mefford, remembering the satisfaction of opening new packs. "The cool thing was that it was an interactive game that you could also collect. We all wanted to have the best cards, but at the same time, you also wanted to have those cards to play with."

The game has been out for more than two decades now, and while Mefford said he hasn't played consistently for that whole time, he never considered it much beyond the game aspect.

The game has developed hundreds of playable characters and adventures that have spanned several fictitious worlds and planes of existence.

"Initially, I never thought of the storyline, I just played the game," said Mefford, reflecting on those early years. "More recently, I have thought it's quite amazing how much they put into it; this world they've created. Now, I actually want to read some of the books to see what the storyline behind some of the revolving conflict is."

This type of imaginary world can be just the type of thing a Sailor needs when underway on a deployment to mentally escape after rigorous flight schedules, never-ending maintenance or mandatory drills. Mefford said playing the game gives him time to think about something completely unrelated to his job and is a lot of fun.

“It’s a great way to spend your down time,” suggested Mefford. “It’s a great way to interact and take your mind off the everyday rigors of deployment. I enjoy spending time with other individuals who are into the same thing as me, enjoy the same hobbies as me and doing that is such a great stress reliever.”

On a ship of more than 5,000 Sailors, it’s impossible to know everyone, but it is possible to make friends outside one’s own shop, division or department. The game can give the nearly 2,000 Sailors who are embarked aboard Truman for the deployment the opportunity to meet people who have similar interests in fantasy fiction role playing games.

“It’s always different people from different assets, or ship’s company or different squadron personnel who come to play,” said Mefford about the people he games with. “As I meet new individuals and learn what their jobs are, it kind of gives me a better understanding of how the whole strike force works.”

One of the people Mefford has met through the game since coming aboard Truman is Aaron Herrington, the ship’s lead Xerox technician.

“He’s very knowledgeable and willing to help new players,” said Herrington.

“He’s the kind of player who doesn’t just sit there and play their turn. He’s good at explaining and discussing each card. That helps make the game more fun.”

From those earliest moments seeing this new game in the halls of the chess tournament and the social interaction between the players, Mefford said that his goal and purpose for playing has shifted from one of a casual player just trying to see what kind of deck would win, to making the game fun for everyone at the table.

“Sometimes, I specifically play to win, and sometimes I play just to have a good time with my friends,” said Mefford.

“Sometimes the longer the game lasts, the better. It’s more fun. That way you get to interact more and everyone has a good time.”

In addition to his motives for playing, Mefford said he has seen the game itself change over the years.

“I remember when I first started playing it, we had no idea what we were doing,” said Mefford. “Whereas now, there is very definitive rules and processes you follow during the game. I would definitely say they’ve made the game much better.”

Mefford is a regular on the aft mess decks on Saturday nights, where Sailors meet to play Magic: the Gathering.
